"Last year—what?" Pietro asked; he had already forgotten the question. "Oh—that I began to—mon dieu—no. Last year! Why, I think it was the day I came and saw you riding Coq."

"Oh, Pietro—if you will talk only nonsense!" Alixe's voice was disappointed. "But why, then, didn't you ever say so before this? We are both a thousand years old now. If you—loved me"—she spoke the word in a lower voice—"why, then, were you as quiet as a mouse about it all these years?"

"I thought you cared for Francois," Pietro said simply. And added, "Didn't you?"

Alixe considered. "I don't—think—I ever did, Pietro. Not really. I thought I did perhaps. He dazzled me—Francois—with his way of doing all sorts of things brilliantly, and that wonderful something about him makes everybody love him. He believed in his star; there was around him the romance of the emperor's prophecy and the romance of the career which is, we believe, about to begin now; there was always a glamour about Francois."

"Yes," Pietro agreed. "The glamour of his courage, Alixe, of loyalty and unselfishness; the qualities which make what people call his charm. Francois is unlike the rest of the world, I believe, Alixe."

Pietro talked on, the silent Pietro, as if delivering a lecture. He had read much and thought much; it was seldom he spoke of the speculations which often filled his scholarly mind; today it seemed easy to talk of everything. Joy had set wide all the doors of his being. Alixe opened her eyes in astonishment.

"Pietro! You are—talking like a book! But it is true; something of that sort has come to me, too—which proves it to be true. I have felt always that Francois had notes in him which are not on our pianos." Pietro smiled, looking at her.

"And yet, Alixe, you do not love Francois, with all these gifts and all his power over hearts—but only commonplace me?"

Alixe straightened against his arm. "Monsieur the Marquis Zappi, the gentleman I—care for, is not commonplace. I thank you not to say it," she shot at him, and then, melting to a sudden intensity, she put a hand on each side of his dark face and spoke earnestly. "Pietro, dear, listen. I believe I always cared for you. When I was little it hurt me to have Francois forever the one to do the daring things. Do you remember how I used to scold at you because you would not fight him?" Pietro smiled again. "Then he was captain of the school and you only a private, and I cried about that when I was alone at night. And when you went off to Italy so quietly, with never a word said about the danger, I did not know that you were doing a fine deed—I thought it a commonplace that you should go back to your country, till Francois opened my eyes."

"Francois?" Pietro asked.

"Yes. The day before he went to join you we were riding together and he told me what it meant to be a patriot in Italy under the Austrians. That day I realized how unbearable it would be if anything happened to you. But I thought I cared for Francois; if he had spoken that day I should have told him that I cared for him. But he did not; he went—and was in prison five years."

"And all that time I believed you loved him, and were mourning for him," Pietro said gently.

"I half believed it too," Alixe answered. "Yet all the time I was jealous for you, Pietro, for it was still Francois who was the hero—not you. Then when there came a question of his rescue I was mad with the desire to have you do it—and you did it."

Her voice dropped. She laid her hand against his shoulder and spoke, in a quick cautious way.

"But all that is immaterial. I just love you—that's the point." A moment later she spoke again. "I want to finish telling you—and then we need never speak of it again. I did think you were—commonplace. And yet I knew in my heart you were not, for I resented your seeming so. So I urged you into danger. I wanted you to be a hero. I had that echo of a schoolgirl's romance about Francois in my mind, and I clung, all along, to the idea that I loved him and that perhaps he secretly loved me but would not say it because he was poor and a peasant; that he was waiting till his future was made. Then, one day, only the other day, he told me that he had asked three wishes of life—'of the good fairies' he said. One was to make Prince Louis Emperor, one was to be Marshal of France; the third—" she stopped.

"What?" Pietro demanded, his mouth a bit rigid.

Alixe flushed and smiled and took Pietro's big hand and covered her eyes with it. "That I should—love you, Monsieur. He said he had wished that all his life."

"May heaven grant him his wish," said Pietro fervently, and then, reflecting, "It seems a strange wish for Francois. You are sure, Alixe?"

"Yes, he said so," Alixe insisted. "Our dear Francois," she went on softly, and the blue intensity of her eyes grew misty. "Dear Francois," she repeated, "it is only he who could have had those three wishes. The single one that was for himself was not because he cared for it himself, but because it was the Emperor's prophecy."

"I always thought," Pietro spoke slowly, "that it was not indeed for himself that he wished to be a Marshal some day, but because it might make him, in a manner, your equal. It was for you."

"For me!" Alixe was astonished. "I never thought of that. I think you thought of it, Pietro, only because you—cared for me—and thought Francois must care also."

"Yes, I thought he cared," Pietro considered. "I can not believe otherwise yet."

"You may believe it." Alixe was firm. "For he said that what he had wished always was that I should—love you. I did it mostly to please Francois," she added serenely.

And Pietro's response to that was apt, but not to be given here. The minds of these two happy lovers were full of that third who had been so close always, to each of them.

"Pietro," Alixe spoke earnestly, coming back to the same subject, "you know that I love Francois—of course. But you do not know in what way. I love him as if he were one of the saints—but also as if he were a helpless little child. Yet not—Pietro—as if he were—the man I love. I would give my life for him in a rush of delight, if he needed it. But I know now, whatever were my vague dreams in past years, that it is not in Francois to care for a woman as a human man."

"I am not so sure," said Pietro, and shook his head.

"You know I am not abusing our Francois," Alixe protested. "Why, Pietro, my father believes, and I believe, that if affairs should so happen that he has his opportunity he may yet be one of the great characters in history. My father says he is made up of inspirations, illuminations—and limitations."

"Yes," said Pietro thoughtfully. "He has the faults of brilliancy and fearlessness. He judges too rapidly. If he were afraid ever—if he saw the other side of a question ever, his judgment would be safer. It may well happen that he will be one of the great men of Europe; it may also happen that by some single act of mismanagement he will throw away his career—or his life. God keep him safe!" Pietro said simply.

Suddenly a Thought Shook Him.

And Alixe echoed it—"God keep him safe!" And then, "I am going to write him, Pietro—about us. My father knows where to reach him at Boulogne I am going to say just a word—that what he has wished for all his life is true. It will get to him the night before the battle."

"Are you sure you are right, Alixe?" Pietro asked doubtfully.

"Sure," said Alixe buoyantly.

"Give him my love, then," said Pietro.

CHAPTER XXXI.

The Night Before.

Out in the dark, in the harbor of Boulogne, the ship Edinburgh Castle lay rocking in the wind. Prince Louis Bonaparte, who had chartered her, and the handful of his followers who had sailed with him on her from England had disembarked quietly at twilight, and in small companies had succeeded in entering the town and the quarters of the officers who were, in France, the nucleus and the hope of their attempt. In the rooms of Lieutenant Aladenize, the host of the Prince, a short council had been held to go over once more the plans which had been discussed and settled by letter for weeks already. The work was carefully arranged; there was almost nothing to be changed, and the little company of men who were trying so large a fate, scattered, with grave faces, with quiet good nights to the Prince who might tomorrow be their Emperor, to the Prince for whose sake they might tomorrow night be any or all ruined men or dead men.

He sat erect and listened. Thelin was brushing clothes with energy in the bedroom, and through another door there came a light sound of a paper turned, of a gay song sung softly. And a glow suddenly warmed the Prince's heart; here was some one who had known his mother, who had been, indeed, for a few days her son; here was some one who cared for him, he believed it, with a half-consuming flame of devotion. Since the man's arrival from Virginia six weeks before, to have him near himself had been a pleasure to Louis Bonaparte; he seemed to bring back the freshness of his early days, of the young confidence when his star shone for him, distant perhaps, but undimmed by the black clouds which drove now across it. He was a bit superstitious about Francois as well, with an idea, which he spoke to no one, that a pivotal interest of his career rested in the modest figure.

He rose, this night in Boulogne, as the paper rustled and the little French provincial chanson sounded from the room where Francois Beaupre, now his secretary, had been installed, and stepped to the closed door.

"De tous cote's l'on que je suis bete."

Francois sang softly. The Prince smiled. As he opened the door the singing stopped; the young man sprang respectfully to his feet, a letter grasped in his hand, and stood waiting.

"Sire!" he said.

Prince Louis flung out his hand with a gesture of impulsiveness strange to his controlled manner, yet not out of drawing to those who knew him well. "Ah, Francois," he cried. "Let the titles go for tonight. Say, 'Louis,' as on that day when we first saw each other; when the four children played together in the old château ruins. And Francois smiled his radiant exquisite smile and answered quietly. "But yes, my brother—Louis." And went on, "I believe I shall not sleep tonight, Louis. I believe I am too happy to sleep."

As one reads a novel for relaxation in the strain of a critical business affair, Prince Louis caught at the distraction of this side issue. The next morning was planned to the last detail; there was nothing to do till daylight, yet he could not sleep at present. Here was a romance of some sort. He sank back on the cushions of the coach of Lieutenant Aladenize's smoking room and put his feet up luxuriously, and slowly lighted a cigar of Havana.

"Tell me," he ordered, and the gentleness of appeal was in the order.

"Sire"—the young man began—and corrected himself. "Louis," he said. The Prince smiled dimly. "Since our landing I have known that a wonderful thing has happened to me. It is"—he spoke lower—"it is the love of the woman who is to me the only one in the world."

"I congratulate you, mon ami," Louis said gently. "Is it by any chance the delightful little Mademoiselle Alixe of the old chateau?"

Beaupre turned scarlet. He was a marvelous man, this Prince Louis. How had he guessed? "She loves me—I have here a letter in which she tells me that she loves me. Will his Highness read it?" With an impetuous step forward he held the paper toward Louis Napoleon.

"I thank you," the Prince said gravely. He read:

"Francois, what you have wished all your life is true. The good fairies have granted one of your wishes before the battle. That they will give you the other two on the day of the battle is the belief of your

"ALIXE."

And below, was written hurriedly, "Pietro sends his love."

The Prince gave back the letter with a respectful hand; then looked at Francois inquiringly. "'What you have wished all your life,' mon ami?" Francois laughed happily. "One must explain, if it will not tire his Highness." And he told, in a few words, of that day when his self-restraint had given way and how, when his guard was down and he was on the point of telling his lifelong secret love, some spirit of perversity—but Francois did not know it was an angel—had caught Alixe, and she had accused him of wishing always that she might love Pietro. And how, meshed in that same net of hurt recklessness, he had answered in her own manner—"Yes," he had said, "it was that which had been the wish of his life—that Alixe might love Pietro!" And Francois laughed gaily, telling the simple entanglement to the Prince, the night before the battle. "One sees how she is quick and clear-sighted, my Alixe," he said. "For she knew well even then it was not that I wished." He stopped, for in the quiet contained look of the listener an intangible something struck a chill to his delicately-poised sensitiveness. "What is it, Louis?" he cried out. "You do not think I mistake her—mistake—Alixe!"

Philosopher's Purpose.

"I am looking for an honest man," said Diogenes.

"What do you want with one?"

"Oh, nothing in particular. My real pilanthropic purpose is to show the world how to conduct a long and resultless investigation with as little expense as possible."

THE SUNBEAM,

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879

Although Wilsen is sitting as hard on the Mexican safety valve as possible, an explosion of hot air is expected any day in congress.—Crookston Daily Times.

The city of Crookston voted bonds to build a new armory. last week, something that is badly needed by that city which is becoming notarious for holding large public gatherings.

Here's hoping some members of those new troops sent to the Mexican border belong to the families of the men who are howling for armed intervention. It may make them take a think.—The Duluth Herald.

Most all of our exchanges from other counties contain numerous announcements of candidates for county office, but the Pennington County fellows who are looking for jobs seem to be conducting a sort of a gum shoe campaign.

While free trade on sugar has closed up the sugar beet factories we have not noticed any perceivable reduction in the price of sugar, but of course free trade will put millions into the pockets of the sugar trust, if it does bust the farmer sugar beet raisers, and give no relief to the consumer.

We have not heard the result of the Republican Conference, held at Minneapolis yesterday, and do not know as they eliminated any of the numerous candidates for governor or not, but if they did not Eberhart will eliminate them in June, and he will get eliminated in November, so this year could properly be called elimination year. The Duluth Herald mentions the name of Ole Sagang, 'the plowman from Ottertail County,"as democratic nominee, and you bet Ole would not have to quit plowing to eliminate Eberhart until there would not be a grease spot left.

We often hear a farmer remark "he is a banker," when they are discussing a candidate's chances for office. Well what if he is a banker and money loaner? That fact does not hurt his honor or integrity in the least, and as for him getting as high a rate of interest for the loaning of his money as he can, would not anyone in his place do the same? Did you ever hear of a farmer offering to sell his grain at five cents a bushel below the market price, in order to be a good fellow? We never did. "But' says one, "the banker takes advantage of your necessity, knowing that you must make a loan of money from him." Well what farmer is there, that would not do the same? For illustration,—Supposing seed potatoes were awful scarce in a certain locality, a good distance from a railroad, and one farmer had a good supply of them for sale. Did you ever see a farmer that would not hoist up the price to the last cent he could get? We never did. The local bankers as a rule are vitally interested in the advancement of the locality in which they live and do business for it is for their interest to be so, for their prosperity depends upon the prosperity of the country in which they live. And we are of the opinion that if anyone cannot give any better reason for not supporting an honorable man for the Legislature than, "That he is a banker," they had better say nothing.

Political Announcement

Inserted by C. L. Hanson and paid for by him at regular advertising rates.

Having been urgently requested by many friends to become a candidate for the State Senate, I have decided to comply with their requests, and offer myself for that important position.

I respectfully solicit the support of the voters of Clearwater, Red Lake and Pennington Counties, at the primary election to be held June 16th, 1814, and if nominated and elected, I pledge my best efforts to the honest and efficient service of the people of my District and State.

I hereby submit my platform for your consideration and approval

I advocate and if elected will support:

Legislation for greater state aid for roads and bridges.

Legislative provision for development of state lands by the state.

Any legislation that will help compel proper business-like economy and increase the efficiency of administration of the State's business affairs.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Corporations, in my opinion should be regulated so as to insure to the public the best possible service in every instance, and should be permitted reasonable returns only, for service rendered.

I am unalterably opposed to "Boss Rules" in politics.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the people in State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of conditions in the rural communities.

Yours very truly,

Ole Sagang for Governor.

The Duluth Herald struck a popular cord, in their issue of March 13th, when they brought out the name of Ole Sagang as the democratic nominee for governor of Minnesota. The mix up among the republicans is sure to give Eberhart the nomination of that party in June, and the next thing the people will be looking for is a man of something of the caliber of Johnson to lead them out of the wilderness, and to clean up that Eberhart machine. Ole Sagang is the one that can do it proper. The Herald adds: If the party did nominate him, "when Ole finishes his plowing" he would sweep this state like a prairie fire driven by a gale through tall grass of a dry autumn.

SAM GORDON'S OPINION.

(Brown's Valley Tribune.)

State Auditor S. G. Iverson has announced himself a candidate for governor at the primaries to be held in June. While it has been known for some time that Mr. Iverson contemplated such a move it was hardly expected that his announcement would come so early. He is a strong man politically, having a wide acquaintance over the state. But it is yet too early to even guess at the outcome of his candidacy.

As a counter move to Mr. Iverson's candidacy Governor Eberhart came forward on the same day and announced the appointment of a committee of thirty men of the state, assigning to them the task of formulating plans for a reorganization of state departments and the making up of a budget to be appropriated by the legislature for current expenses. In taking such action the governor seeks to usurp legislative authority as well as executive authority and takes the position that the duly elected and accredited representatives of the people in the legislature are not to be trusted with such important legislation but after it has been formulated and passed upon by the "Thirty Wise Men" appointed by Eberhart the legislature will be permitted to convene and ratify it. We do not consider the governor has any right to appoint such a committee unless instructed to do so by the legislature and the legislature has not so instructed him. It is purely a political move and will so be considered by the people of the state. Some of the men appointed are capable, representative citizens, while others cannot be so classed.

EYE FOCUSED ON CHAIR.

(Brainerd Dispatch.)

The announcement of his candidacy for governor by Sam Iverson has started things moving in the political line in state politics. Mr. Iverson has long had his eye focused on the governor's chair and his wide acquaintance throughout the state makes him a formidable candidate. He has occupied the position of state auditor for many years.

Mrs. Bretta Narveson, will sell her stock of five horses, cows farm machinery and a lot of seed oats and barley, at public auction, on her farm one mile south west of Highlanding on March 25th. Mrs. Narveson has decided to quit farming and all stock will be sold to the highest bidder.

That county ferry that was to be put in at Highlanding seems to be rather slow in being materialized. First they got the money appropriated. Then they waited until the county was ready to pay it, then they ordered the lumber of a man that has to let it grow in the woods, get it sawed, and deliver it, so there is not much prospect of having any county ferry at Highlanding before the freeze up next fall. Later: We understand that they will wait after the lumber is in Thief River Falls until some one donates the hauling of it out.

The town of Highlanding will hire men and teams to widen the road grades running north from Highlanding post office, as soon as the frost is out of the ground. Of course the ditch contractors were paid for doing this work but were paid for the work before they had it done, and naturally quit as soon as they got their pay. They were to make the grade sixteen feet wide on top, but the [illegible] did not seem to have had a tape line over ten feet long, which is about the average width of a lot of these grades. But there is no one out anything by this kind of work, only the tax payers.

NEW BANK AT HIGHLADING

Articles of Incorporation are out to establish a new bank at Highlanding.

The new bank will be established as a branch of the Merchants National Bank, of Crookston, and will have the necessary capital to invest to take hold and help the the farmers to develop this rich agricultural country.

It will not be a bank that will advertise "to stay by you when you are in a pinch" and as soon as you get into a "pinch" compel you to pay them every cent that is coming to them forthwith but will furnish the capital to take hold and help build up the country, the same as the Merchants National Bank of Crookston has done.

WORKING OR A TALKING GOVERNOR.

(Dawson Sentinel.)

Iverson is opposed by the interests that support Eberhart. True, his is not of the progressives who proclaim themselves from the housetops; there is nothing of the "holier-than-thou" in his makeup. But his public record is that of a man who has practiced, even if he has not preached, the square deal.

He has met his duties with honesty, efficiency and fairness. He has treated his friends and his enemies without fear, favor or fawning. His acts have proclaimed him a man. There is nothing that any progressive wants that he does not offer, except loud professions. And, seriously, the time has come to choose between a talking governor and a working governor.

TESTED SEED CORN.

Many inquiries are received by the Thief River Falls High School for reliable seed corn raised in this section of the state. The school has some guaranteed seed of standard varieties for sale, and also a list of farmers who have good seed to spare. All successful corn growers and corn experts earnestly advise against the moving of seed corn more than 100 miles north, and even suggest that corn cannot be safely moved more than 50 miles north in one season. In view of the importance of using local grown seed, the High School desires to serve as a medium for bringing the seller and the buyer together. All persons having seed corn for sale are requested to add their names to the list already on file at the High School stating the amount and variety of seed they offer, and buyers may in like manner register their needs. All corn will be tested free of charge. As reliable seed corn of local growth is now held at $4 per bushel, it behooves both sides to get busy at once.

In addition to the work already accomplished by the High School along development lines, it is essential that farm clubs and farming organizations be perfected in every town in Pennington county. During the month of March the territory immediately about Thief River Falls will be organized. The co-operation of all interested persons is requested, that this foundational work may be promptly and successfully accomplished in order that more important matters may receive consideration later. The High School can secure organizers and entertainers and also supply experts and lecturers from abroad and at no cost to any one. In addition to the efforts which may originate at the school, it might be added that club or community movements initiated by the farmers themselves will have the active support and assistance of the school people.

Any correspondence directed to the High School will receive prompt attention.

FOR PROGRESSIVES AND RIGHT THINKERS.

The voters of the state were agreeably surprised when State Auditor Samuel G. Iverson announced himself as a candidate for the Republican nomination for governor of Minnesota. For some weeks past Mr. Iverson has been visiting different parts of the state and wherever he went he received encouragement. Mr. Iverson has been state auditor for many years and during his regime has made the cleanest record ever made by a state official and in going before the people in the gubernatorial campaign can stand on that record alone and win in a walk. All progressive and right thinking voters of the state, and they are in the great majority, will cast their ballot for S. G. Iverson at the primaries next summer.

DIZZY, HEADACHY, SICK, "CASCARETS"

Gently cleanse your liver and sluggish bowels while you sleep.

Get a 10-cent box.

Sick headache, biliousness, dizziness, coated tongue, foul taste and foul breath—always trace them to torpid liver; delayed, fermenting food in the bowels or sour, gassy stomach.

Poisonous matter clogged in the intestines, instead of being cast out of the system is re-absorbed into the blood. When this poison reaches the delicate brain tissue it causes congestion and that dull, throbbing, sickening headache.

Cascarets immediately cleanse the stomach, remove the sour, undigested food and foul gases, take the excess bile from the liver and carry out all the constipated waste matter and poisons in the bowels.

A Cascaret to-night will surely straighten you out by morning. They work while you sleep—a 10-cent box from your druggist means your head clear, stomach sweet and your liver and bowels regular for months. Adv.

MAKING OVER OLD FRIENDS

Much Time Wasted in Effort to Do What Probably No One Ever Really Succeeded In.

"I remember how once in my life, I wasted untold energy trying to make over my dearest friends," writes David Grayson in the American Magazine. "There was Harriet, for example, dear, serious, practical Harriet. I used to be fretted by the way she was forever trying to clip my wings—I suppose to keep me close to the quiet and friendly and unadventurous roost! We come by such a long road; sometimes, to the acceptance of our nearest friends for exactly what they are. Because we are so fond of them we try to make them over to suit some curious ideal of perfection of our own—until one day we suddenly laugh aloud at our own absurdity (knowing that they are probably trying as hard to reconstruct us as we are to reconstruct them!) and therefore we try no more to change them, we just love 'em and enjoy 'em!"

Yeast the Best Medicine for Boils.

One of the most efficient cures for a boil is common yeast—about one-third of a compressed yeast cake dissolved in a glass of water and taken once or twice a day.

Besides this, the bowels should be kept open and the food changed. There is no one best local treatment, but Dr. D. Macfarlan of Philadelphia gives some sound common sense advice. The boil should not be lanced until it has "come to a head." As soon as it begins to develop it should be poulticed with warm bread and milk to which a small quantity of yeast has been added. The poultice should not be too hot and should be changed at least three times a day. As soon as the tissues begin to soften and the abscess is well defined it should be lanced in the form of an X and the core removed at the first dressing, if possible.

The wound should be syringed and swabbed with a solution of potassium mercuric-iodide, one part in 2,000 of water, and wet dressings of the same solution should be applied until the sore has healed.

The Sort.

"What breed of dogs would you suggest to guard the henyard?"

"Setters."

NOT A MIRACLE
Just Plain Cause and Effect.

There are some quite remarkable things happening every day, which seem almost miraculous.

Some persons would not believe that a man could suffer from coffee drinking so severely as to cause spells of unconsciousness. And to find relief in changing from coffee to Postum is well worth recording.

"I used to be a great coffee drinker, so much so that it was killing me by inches. My heart became so weak I would fall and lie unconscious for an hour at a time.

"My friends, and even the doctor, told me it was drinking coffee that caused the trouble. I would not believe it, and still drank coffee until I could not leave my room.

"Then my doctor, who drinks Postum himself, persuaded me to stop coffee and try Postum. After much hesitation I concluded to try it. That was eight months ago. Since then I have had but few of those spells, none for more than four months.

"I feel better, sleep better and am better every way. I now drink nothing but Postum and touch no coffee, and as I am seventy years of age all my friends think the improvement quite remarkable."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for a copy of the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

LIQUOR QUESTION BIG STATE ISSUE

"WETS" CAPTURE 96 TOWNS AND "DRY" FORCES WIN IN 113.

SALOON MEN GAIN 9 PLACES

Antis Throw Twenty-Seven More Towns Into the Prohibition Column and are Happy as a Result of the Returns.

Minneapolis.—Municipalities voting on the license question Tuesday were carried for the most part by the "dry" element, which captured 113 of the places reported, to 96 which voted for license.

Of the 113 "dry" towns, 27 now have saloons and will close up their bars as a result of the vote. The most notable change is Owatonna, which has 5,658 people by the last census, but now by its first vote on the question joins the list of saloonless cities. Princeton and Slayton are other county seat towns which swung from the "wet" to the "dry" column.

The "wets" regained eight places as reported here, the most important being Wells, a place of 1,755 people. Following are the changes as reported:

CONDEMN DUNN ROAD LAW

Voters of Mansfield Township, Freeborn County, Declare New Act Unreasonable.

Albert Lea.—At the village election in Mansfield township the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"The voters of Mansfield township, Freeborn county, condemn and declare the so-called Dunn's good-road law to be unjust and unreasonable and the most despotic law ever enacted.

"Whereas, The appointive power given into the hands of the governor to appoint a state highway commission, consisting of three members, with the arbitrary power to distribute the money in such ways that it can be centralized to benefit only the few at the unjust taxation of the many;

"Be It, Therefore, Resolved, That we, the people of the town of Mansfield, condemn the aforesaid law and ask all right-minded men to assist in bringing about its repeal.

"We absolutely refuse to raise money under the rules of this law."

Mississippi Clearing of Ice.

Winona.—The Mississippi river is breaking its winter fetters. The river is clear of ice from the foot of Lake Pepin to Betsey slough, three miles above Winona. The ice has started to move out immediately below this city and soon will be clear all the way up to Lake Pepin.

Albert Lea.—Judge Kingsley of Austin opened court in this city from the adjournment taken Feb. 20. The first case to come up was the West Freeborn church case against Rev. T. J. Strand. Rev. H. J. Strand, brother of the defendant, who was pastor of the East, North and Central churches, was ousted by order of the court in February, and it is on like charges that T. J. Strand is being tried. Judge Kingsley decided in favor of the anti-Strand congregations on every point, but granted a stay of sixty days.

RAY SPEER, NEW STATE FAIR PUBLICITY AGENT

Ray P. Speer, a Twin Cities newspaper man, is the new supervisor of publicity and advertising of the Minnesota State Fair. He has been elected by the Fair Board to succeed M. E. Harrison, who resigned last fall to become executive secretary of the West Central Minnesota Development Association. Mr. Speer is a graduate of the University of Wisconsin and will receive a degree at the Minnesota Agricultural College this spring. He is the author of an agricultural extension bulletin on "Bundle Corn and Beef Production," was joint editor, with Superintendent A. D. Wilson, of Minnesota Farmers' Institute Annual No. 25 on "Farm Management"; and has been conducting an extensive apple marketing investigation for the State Horticultural Society and the Minnesota Agricultural College. He has been a frequent contributor to the agricultural press.

JUDGE CHAS. WILLARD DIES

Nervous Breakdown Causes Death of Federal District Jurist of Minnesota.

Minneapolis, March. 16. — Judge Charles A. Willard of the United States district court, district of Minnesota, is dead at his home, after an illness of five weeks due to a nervous breakdown. His wife and two small sons were at his bedside when the end came.

Judge Willard came to Minnesota first in 1882, opening a law office in St. Paul. In 1885 he moved to Minneapolis where he began the practice of law.

In 1901 Judge Willard was appointed associate justice of the supreme court at Manila, Philippine Islands. He remained until 1909.

While in Manila he learned the Spanish language and rewrote those portions of the Spanish code which were retained by the Americanized version of the code for the islanders.

He was appointed United States district judge for Minnesota, July 2, 1909, by President William H. Taft, his personal friend.

DRINKERS FOR 5-CENT BEER

Sign Petition Because Price is Boosted and International Falls Will Vote.

International Falls. — A petition signed by 105 legal voters calling for a vote on the license question has been filed with the city clerk by Dr. M. E. Withrow, Rev. E. L. Heermanes and Rev. Father P. J. Killeen, as a committee from the Law and Order league, organized in this city two months ago.

International Falls has thirteen saloons, most of which are owned by breweries. A peculiar circumstance in connection with the petition is the fact that the majority of signers are drinking men who seem to have gone on a strike for 5-cent beer, the price now being 10 cents.

Both sides already claim a victory. The election will be held April 7.

Bitten 7 month Ago; Dies.

Minneapolis.—Bitten seven months ago by his pet dog, Frederick M. Greene, St. Paul, died in Cobb hospital from hydrophobia. He was manager and buyer of the John Leslie Paper company of Minneapolis, and had been connected with the firm, in which he was a stockholder, for 14 years. His wife and two daughters, survive him. Mr. Greene was bitten in the lower arm by the dog last August, while playing with the animal.

Chicken Thief to Prison.

Stillwater. — George Thompson, arrested on a charge of burglary for stealing chickens, pleaded guilty and was sentenced to state's prison on the indeterminate plan. Link Tayer is being held as an accomplice of Thompson, and will likely remain in jail until the grand jury meets in May. John Julin, a well-to-do farmer, was committed to the state hospital at Rochester. His skull was fractured in an accident two years ago and his mental trouble is attributed to that injury.

USE ELECTRICITY ON RANGE

Mining Companies Are Gradually Doing Away With Use of Steam.

Brainerd.—Electricity is in a large degree replacing steam on the Cuyuna iron range in Crow Wing county. The Armour No. 2 mine, near Crosby and Ironton and the Kennedy mine of the Rodgers, Brown Ore company, at Cuyuna have electric underground and surface haulage, with power from their own plants.

At the Rowe pit mine at Riverton the Pittsburgh Steel Ore company is supplied with current from the Cuyuna Range Power company and uses it to run its pumps, sandsuckers, hydraulic equipment and machine shop. The Cuyuna Range Power company, whose plant is on the Crow Wing river, west of Brainerd, closed a contract to furnish current to a 1,200-gallan pump at the Armour No. 2 mine of the Rogers, Brown Ore company. At the Wilcox mine of the Canadian-Cuyuna Ore company, six miles east of Brainerd, the mining company is considering using electric power for mining, hoisting and haulage, backed up by a steam reserve plant.

INDICTED FOR DRUNKENNESS

Grand Jury at Fairmont Sets New Precedent by Recent Action.

Fairmont.—Indicted here by the grand jury for the crime of drunkenness, Oliver C. Ogden pleaded guilty in district court before Judge Quinn and was sentenced to forty days in jail. The sentence was suspended on the prisoner's promise of good behavior for a period of one year.

This is the first instance in Minnesota where a person has been indicted for being drunk. The Sentinel of this city says: "This procedure here practically amounts to official notice from the highest judicial authority in this district that men who are in the habit of getting drunk may expect to be haled into court and punished on indictments returned by the grand jury."

Janesville to the Front.

Janesville.—This city is making every effort to be chosen by the Minnesota League of Municipalities for the survey which the league is contemplating making of some Minnesota town this spring. At a recent meeting of the city council and Commercial club it was voted that the city should defray the expenses of those who would come to make the survey if their town was chosen. Sentiment in the town is overwhelming in the demand that plans for the future growth be made. Mayor Willis of Janesville recently called upon Mr. Price of the extension division of the university urging that this city be chosen.

Great Potato Possibilities.

St. Paul.—Answering the warning in the Department of Agriculture's report that more potatoes must be raised in the United State to head off impending importation, Fred D. Sherman, Minnesota assistant commissioner of immigration, declared the northern sections of Minnesota and Wisconsin will raise enough potatoes to supply eventually the whole of the United States, today. "With our great resources," the report says, "it should be entirely unnecessary for us to import potatoes, but the production must be increased."

Lake Crystal Club Reorganizes.

Lake Crystal.—The Commercial club has been organized as the successor to the Board of Trade, and the following officers chosen: President, P. D. Neff, first vice president, G. L. Fitch; second, George E. Austin; secretary, Fred Austin; treasurer, W. H. James; directors, the above officers, with M. L. Jones, C. H. Jones, J. C. James, M. J. Barney and F. A. Bartlett.

Stockmen Meet at Wendell.

Wendell—The Farmers' Shipping association held its annual meeting here. The amount received for stock the eleven months of its operation was $27,004.69. The following officers were elected: President, H. T. Haavig; vice president, Hans Vigen; secretary and treasurer, K. J. Folken; directors, Ole K. Olson, Howard Weaver and O. K. Rustand.

Rebekahs in District Convention.

Wheaton.—A district meeting of Rebekahs was held here and a special car brought delegates from Ortonville and Clinton. The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. E. N. Boley, of Wheaton; vice president, Mrs. Beatty of Clinton. After the meeting, thirty candidates were initiated.

Blooded Stock on Sale.

Thief River Falls. — A carload of full-blooded Holstein cattle that the People's State bank of this city placed on exhibit were viewed by over one hundred and fifty farmers. The bank recently purchased thirty-nine cattle from the southern part of the state and brought them to this city and has just disposed of them at cost to farmers who are interested in dairying. The cows are all from registered stock and dairymen who saw them pronounced them excellent animals.

FEW PRACTICAL HINTS

BAD THING TO HUNT UP UNNECESSARY WORK FOR BOYS.

Make All Necessary Preparations for Spring Work—Get Harness, Plows, Implements and Everything Else in Proper Shape.

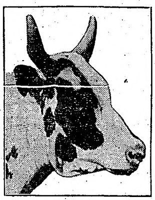
If you can possibly afford it, keep one horse for your wife's uses, and let nobody else ride or drive it.

Hope you did not make the boys work hard all through the holiday season when they came home from college. Of course they ought to help out whenever it is necessary, but it is a bad thing to hunt up unnecessary work just to keep a growing boy jumping.

Better be honest and square with your boy every time. Cannot fool him very much, because he generally knows his father as well as the old gentleman knows himself.

How are the roads in your neighborhood? Better organize a good-roads club. If your neighbors do not take any interest try to arrange for a good talk on the subject at the institute meetings.

It is not too early to begin to make arrangements for spring work. It will be on top of us before we know it, and then what a rush there will be to get harness, plows and everything else in shape. Some of us won't have time to do it properly if we wait too long.



A Good Type of Dairy Cow.

Don't get grouchy because your neighbor has a better house or a bigger barn than you have. Maybe your mortgage is not as big as his, and that's a heap of comfort.

The chronic borrower is a great nuisance in the neighborhood. Of course we are all glad to lend to a man who is just getting a start, but the man who is able to buy everything he needs, but continues to use his neighbor's tools, ought to be ashamed of himself.

Not going to send the boy to an agricultural college because you had no such education yourself? That's a mighty poor excuse. Now, right down in the bottom of your heart, are you not afraid that the boy will learn to be a better farmer than you, and you are not manly enough to be proud of him?

If the scale has made its appearance in your orchard, you should begin spraying at once and never stop until it is subdued. Your neighbor may be working hard to keep his fruit trees in good condition, and it is not fair that insects should be allowed to flourish in your orchard to be blown across the fence into your neighbor's trees.

I sold a cow last fall that was giving six quarts of milk at each milking. She was driven five miles and housed in a strange stable. That evening she gave just one quart, and only four quarts the next morning. She was treated kindly enough, and the decrease in her milk flow was caused entirely by nervousneses. That's an object lesson for men who occasionally kick and beat their cows.

COLD FRAMES MORE POPULAR

Great Many Farmers and Gardeners Realize What It Pays to Grow Vegetables Under Sash.

Frames are used much more largely in all parts of the country than a few years ago, notwithstanding the fact that greenhouse construction has been more active. A great many gardeners have realized that it pays to grow some vegetables under 3x6 foot sash. This makes it a good business proposition and when frames are used on a large scale too much care cannot be exercised in the preparation of the soil. It should be fine, fairly level and contain liberal amounts of sand and humus. If to be used in the summer the cross-bars should be easily removed so that wheel hoes or horse cultivators can be used without difficulty, running from end to end of the long frames. The sash should fit snugly on the side boards, so that as little cold as possible will be admitted under the sash. Lettuce and radish are especially desirable for frame culture.

No Excuse for Cholera.

If it were not for hog cholera pork raisers would be living in the lap of luxury. The time will come when there will be no more excuse for hog cholera than for the human cholera that until a century or so ago periodically devastated Europe and America. Both are essentially filth diseases.

Placing Profits.

Put out the middleman and put the profits where they belong—in the pockets of the farmer and his wife.

MAKES HARD WORK HARDER

A bad back makes a day's work twice as hard. Backache usually comes from weak kidneys, and if headaches, dizziness or urinary disorders are added, don't wait—get help before the kidney disease takes a grip—before dropsy, gravel or Bright's disease sets in. Doan's Kidney Pills have brought new life and new strength to thousands of working men and women. Used and recommended the world over.

A CALIFORNIA CASE

"Every Picture Tells a Story"

Louis C. Wardwell, 1550 Pacific St., San Bernardino, Cal., says: "I had so much pain in my back I could hardly get off and on the wagon. The jarring I got while riding brought on the trouble. The kidney secretions were filled with sediment. I tried many remedies, but Doan's Kidney Pills were the only one that cured me. They drove away all the pain and lameness and fixed my kidneys up in good shape."

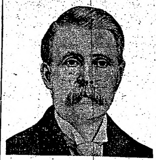
Eats Freely But Has No Dyspepsia

A Little Pepsin in a Mild Laxative Promptly Corrected a Bad Indigestion.



J. W. GOUCHER

Fortunate is the one who can eat "anything" without suffering the tortures of dyspepsia, but as few are so fortunate, care should be taken in the matter of diet. Eating slowly, masticating the food thoroughly and taking a short walk after the heavy meal of the day will do much towards assisting digestion. Any grown-up person ought to know the peculiar foods that do not agree, and these should be avoided.

When these common-sense aids fail, the next thing to do is to take a mild digestive tonic with laxative properties, and there is none better than Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It contains the greatest of all aids to digestion, good pepsin. It has other ingredients that act mildly on the bowels, which together form a combination for the relief of dyspepsia or indigestion that is unsurpassed.

Its action is to tone and strengthen the stomach and bowel muscles so that they can again do their work naturally without outside aid, and when that happy moment comes all medicine can be dispensed with. It is the best remedy obtainable for any disorder of the stomach, liver and bowels, for dyspepsia, constipation, biliousness, headaches, drowsiness after eating, gas on the stomach, etc. Thousands of users will testify to this, among them Mr. J. W. Goucher, Stites, Idaho, who for several years had all the worst symptoms of chronic dyspepsia. Since taking Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin these have all gone, and although Mr. Goucher says he is 64, he does not look more than 40.

Syrup Pepsin is sure in its results, and a vast improvement over chewing or swallowing tablets and mints, or taking cathartics, salts, etc., all of which are harsh and nauseous and at best do but temporary good. You can obtain Syrup Pepsin at any drug store for fifty cents or one dollar a bottle. Results are always guaranteed or money will be refunded.

Families wishing to try a free sample bottle can obtain it postpaid by addressing Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 203 Washington St., Monticello, Ill. A postal card with your name and address on it will do.

Dudley Field Maloney, the new collector of the port of New York, said at a recent luncheon:

"Thanks to the government's good work, smuggling has practically ceased among us. Every importer, public or private, now says to himself when he imports anything, whether it's a suit of clothes or a million's worth of tapestries:

"'The path of duty is through the custom house.'"

BACKACHE-RHEUMATISM QUICKLY VANISHES

Even Most Chronic Sufferers Find Relief From Few Doses of Croxone.

Croxone soon relieves such conditions because it reaches the very roots of the disease. It soaks right into the stopped-up, inactive kidneys, through the walls and linings; cleans out the little filtering cells and glands; neutralizes and dissolves the poisonous uric acid substances that lodge in the joints and muscles to scratch and irritate and cause rheumatism; heals the inflamed membranes of the bladder, and cleans out and strengthens the stopped-up, lifeless kidneys so they can filter and sift all the poisons from the blood, and drive it out of the system.

So sure, so positive, so quick and lasting, are the results obtained from the use of Croxone, that three doses a day for a few days are often all that is required to end the worst backache, regulate the most annoying bladder disorders, and overcome the numerous other similar conditions.

Croxone is so prepared that it is practically impossible to take it without results.

An original package costs but a trifle, and all druggists are authorized to return the purchase price if Croxone fails to give desired results, regardless of how old you are, how long you have suffered, or what else has failed.—Adv.

SAVED BY A GIRL

By GEORGE ELMER COBB.

I was about at the end of my resources, in fact stranded in Paris with few friends, and my art education not yet completed. Up to a few months a benevolent half uncle in New York had financed me. He had died and I had no further dependence on that source as his estate had gone to others.

I sat in my very humble room in the student's quarter one chilly wintry evening calculating my slim funds and prospects. There seemed no way open for me except to give up a cherished proposition for a trade and return to my native soil. There came a tap at the door.

"It is Adrian Morse, the artist?" inquired a man fairly well dressed, extremely courteous but possessed of a searching sinister eye that I did not like. I bowed at his query.

"I have come on a matter of business," continued my visitor, but he did not explain how he had heard of me or if he had been directed to me. His next words, however, showed that he knew of my forlorn condition, for he remarked:

"I understand that you need work, and I promise you a rich fee if you will pack up a few of your utensils and accompany me briefly."

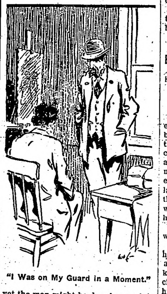
"To paint a picture?" I inquired bluntly.

"No, to repair and touch up a damaged canvas," he replied. "It is not far and I have a cab in waiting."

Of course I went. I made up my palette, some colors and tools into a small package and was ready for him almost immediately.

As he crowded into the vehicle beside me I heard him give a low voiced order to the driver to proceed to a certain street. I had never been in that thoroughfare, but I had heard of the locality, the most notorious and dangerous in Paris, in fact a favorite rendezvous of the Parisian bandits.

I do not know why, but instantly my suspicions were aroused. I was a poor specimen to select for plunder, yet the man might be drawing me into some complication of peril and crime and my fears took the alarm at once.



"I Was on My Guard in a Moment."

"I have changed my mind—I will not accompany you," I declared sharply, and I reached my hand to seize the strap and signal the driver to stop. The hand of my companion shot forward to deter me. As it grazed my own I felt some thin sharp metal point pierce my hand.

"Ah! you were so precipitate you have wounded yourself on the edge of my sleeve button," spoke my companion." "I wished to explain—um'm-um'm—" His words faded into a droning, meaningless mutter, and a black veil seemed to cross my eyes.

I did not realize it then, but I knew later that this man had used upon me one of those tiny poison needles, a formidable accessory of the criminals of Paris for drugging or killing a troublesome victim.

I had no sense of consciousness after that until I found myself seated in a chair in a close, stuffy room. The man who had drugged me stood before me smiling in a cynical, triumphant manner.

"You forced me to act in an arbitrary way," he said. "No harm has been done. There are your tools of trade," and he pointed to a table where lay the parcel I had brought from my poor studio. "And there," and he indicated an easel, "is the canvas we wish you to fix up."

I stared in wonder, but with a positive thrill at an unframed painting held by brads across a board upon the easel, for it was "The Watchers."

Who in France has not heard of "The Watchers," that notable chef d'oeuvre of an obscure artist who gained fame only after his death? Who also, as I, did not know of its mysterious theft from the Louvre, of a fabulous reward offered for its discovery and the conviction of the thieves. In a flash I recognized the situation. In despoiling the frame in the great picture gallery of this cherished gem, the robber had torn and defaced one corner of the priceless canvas.

"It will be five hundred dollars if you restore that painting to a presentable condition. Can you do it?"

I was on my guard in a moment. I realized how I should act and what I should do. I doubted if I would receive the money promised or be allowed to depart after I had done my work, and I set my wits at work to circumvent this probable agent of a set of desperadoes. I assented to his proposition.

"Very well," he said, "I will go and bring you some refreshments and stimulants, for your experience coming here may have unnerved you."

And then he was gone. In an instant I had that precious canvas released from the easel, rolled up under my arm and a dash made for the nearest window.

As I leaped out I landed in a close court. I heard a shout from the room I had just vacated, I saw a face at its window. A door in the adjoining building was open. I ran towards it, to come upon a staircase. I followed its windings, an uproar pursuing me. I reached the second floor of the building, seized the knob of the first door I came to and bolted into a lighted room.

"I am being pursued by desperadoes from the next building," I said hurriedly. "Save me, hide me, and I—"

I was about to say: "And I will reward you richly," but the eyes that met my own told of real sympathy, a slight shudder that she realized my peril.

"This way, quick," she said, and moved towards a bed. Within it lay an old man, evidently an invalid, asleep or unconscious. She bade me climb behind him, covered me up and then resumed her seat.

The banging at the doors, the loud shouts told that my pursuers dominated and terrorized their neighbors. Finally the door was thrust open. My captor fiercely challenged the girl.

She pointed a warning finger to her lip and pointed at her invalid father. The intruder looked under the bed, explored a closet and then proceeded on his fruitless search.

I stole a glance at the fair girl who had saved me. There was a beautiful woman depicted in the canvas I had rescued, but not to compare with the serene yet sensitive countenance of my gracious friend.

An hour later, enveloped in an old coat that she had loaned me, I left the building and reached the police.

I will not tell the royal reward I received for returning the stolen picture, but it was enough to complete my education and get married on.

And she who shared my little fortune was the lovely girl who had helped me to win it.

BAD CHECKS WERE COMMON

Hotel Man Recalls the Ways of Some Slick Swindlers in the Past.

"Owing to the great carelessness exercised in cashing checks, it used to be possible for anybody who knew the lay of the land to work off bad checks on a hotel where I used to be a room clerk," said a former hotel man yesterday. "I flatter myself, however, that of all the half a million dollars' worth of paper I O. K.'d during the half dozen years I was connected with the establishment neither the hotel nor I lost a cent.

"But time and time again I used to witness a performance like this:

"A man would arrive and register himself as 'Reginald W. Drexel, Philadelphia,' or give an equally well known family name in some other city. The head clerk would fall over himself in his anxiety to give the new arrival one of the best rooms in the house. A little later, the stranger, having inquired the name of the chief clerk, would approach and speak to him:

"'Oh, Mr. Blank, my uncle told me to see you and make myself known. He said if I should happen to need any money while I was in New York, you would be able to fix it up for me.'

"'I shall be only too glad,' the head clerk would reply. 'It was very thoughtful of your uncle to remember me. I hope he is well. Come right this way.'

"Then he would hustle the man, a perfect stranger to him, over to the cashier's window, and introduce him, and say it was all right if 'Mr. Drexel' wanted to get any checks cashed or needed any money.

"'Mr. Drexel' would soon find himself a 'little short,' and the cashier would let him have a couple of hundred dollars or more perhaps once or twice. Then the young man would suddenly leave the hotel the next day, with no suspicion being aroused, in case he had drawn cash, for perhaps a month or more, when his 'uncle' in Philadelphia, in reply to a bill sent him, would indignantly disclose that Mr. 'Reginald W. Drexel' was an impostor. If it was a check that young 'Mr. Drexel' had cashed, he was sure to have gone before the bank on which it was drawn could get word to New York that the draft was worthless."

Brawn and Brain.

The bishop of Liverpool, speaking at a prize distribution, incidentally drew from the recent Wells-Carpentier fight an interesting lesson, which parents would do well to observe. With a smile his lordship remarked that he knew very little about boxing, but he had read an article in a leading London journal on the progress of that memorable fight. From this he gathered that the secret of the Frenchman's victory was that he evidently used his muscles and his brain, whereas the Englishman apparently trusted almost entirely to his muscles. The result was that muscles and brain won, and he impressed upon the parents the value of the combination. It would be to the benefit of the nation to have a strain of boys with robust health and well-trained minds.

Damsel Put Question of Little Nap or Silly Talk Up to Her Escort, and It Was a "Go."

He was taking her home from the theater. The car was crowded, but they had obtained a seat together, and they were in each other's exclusive company for 45 minutes.

"Are you thinking of going away this summer?" said he, trying to conceal a yawn.

"I guess so," she answered, making a lady-like motion with her muff.

"I went away last summer," he continued, several blocks later. "Did you?"

"I think we did," she said. "Say, may I ask you something?"

"Anything."

"Now, listen, I'm having just as hard a time to stay awake as you are. If you'll just shut up until we get to my street, I can have a nice little nap. So can you. And you'll like me a lot better than if we'd try to converse, and I'd fairly love you. And maybe I'd invite you out to call. Is it a go?"

"Angel! It is!" It was with difficulty that he kept from embracing her. Girls like that are so rare. Later they lived happily ever after.

THE BEST TREATMENT FOR ITCHING SCALPS, DANDRUFF AND FALLING HAIR

To allay itching and irritation of the scalp, prevent dry, thin and falling hair, remove crusts, scales and dandruff, and promote the growth and beauty of the hair, the following special treatment is most effective, agreeable and economical. On retiring, comb the hair out straight all around, then begin at the side and make a parting, gently rubbing Cuticura Ointment into the parting with a bit of soft flannel held over the end of the finger. Anoint additional partings about half an inch apart until the whole scalp has been treated, the purpose being to get the Cuticura Ointment on the scalp skin rather than on the hair. It is well to place a light covering over the hair to protect the pillow from possible stain. The next morning, shampoo with Cuticura Soap and hot water. Shampoos alone may be used as often as agreeable, but once or twice a month is generally sufficient for this special treatment for women's hair.

The Treasure of Egypt

An Audacious Hazard of Nikolai, Independent Agent, as Related by His Lieutenant, Summers

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright, 1913, by W. G. Chapman)

The most bizarre of all the coups of Nikolai occurred during the year of the great cotton famine, which was ended so spectacularly. Cotton had monopolized the interest even of the daily newspapers. A ring of speculators in Chicago had formed a corner, and prices went rocketing skyward. Cotton had been scarce throughout the southern states that year, and high prices proved a bonanza to growers in the belt. But over in Lancashire, which supplies the finished goods for three parts of the world, spindles stood idle, for no manufacturer could afford to pay the current price of the staple. Misery and destitution stalked through the homes of the workers.

Nikolai had been reading the exchange reports; at last he threw down the newspaper.

"It seems essential of modern civilization," he said, "that the success of one must be based upon the failure of another. Here we have a case in point. South Carolina farmers are going in for automobiles while Lancashire lacks bread. And I am ruined while the Chicago speculators are making millions. Do you believe that there is a providence that interferes arbitrarily with human destinies, Summers?"

"Possibly—but only through the slow working out of cosmic forcess," I answered.

"But men can sometimes play Providence," he answered. "Cotton is at twenty-five today—twelve points above the normal. Two days ago I sold September cotton at twenty-two on the London exchange, thinking that the pool would break up and prices tumble. They have a fortnightly settling day here, and in twelve days I shall have to deliver. And I shall have to buy in at about twenty-eight and be ruined."

Prices were rising almost hourly. There was hardly the remotest prospect of a fall. Every financial paper foretold that cotton would be up to twenty-eight, if not to thirty, by the next settling day on "'Change."

"It is fortunate that the United States has the monopoly of cotton production," I mused.

"It has not," interrupted my companion, Algeria, India, and Egypt. The latter is, however, the only country that can compete seriously with America. If Egypt produces a bumper crop, prices fall. Yet today the fields of the Carolinas are white with the bursting pods, while Egypt is a desert, until the British government gives the signal to transform it into a garden."

"Will they not let the plants be put in the ground?" I queried.

"The plants are in the ground," said Nikolai bitterly. "But they will not grow without water. Do you know that Egypt is the Nile—that every year, when the Nile overflows its banks, the wilderness is transformed? Formerly nature produced this phenomenon unassisted. But now—well have you not heard of the new dam at Assousan?"

"Completed last year to store the waters until the government decides to open the sluices?"

Nikolai nodded. "And ten days afterward Egypt is a granary and a cotton store. If the gates were opened today prices would go tumbling. Cotton would fall to nearly normal, and I should be able to buy in at fifteen and clear a substantial profit. Imagine it, Summers; seven hundred miles of cotton fields, bursting into bloom. And all hinges upon the government's hydraulic gates!

"Do you know how they built this dam." Nikolai resumed. "There was but one spot where it could be done, and they submerged a temple, half explored, that gave promise of treasure greater than any dug from the Pharaohs' graves. Summers, it was whispered that half a million pounds in gold lay buried nine feet below the surface of the floods. Why should not we dig out this treasure and thus recoup ourselves?"

"It is impossible!" I cried.

"Not at this season," Nikolai rejoined. "When the floods are swollen to the limit of the capacity of the dam it is impossible, but now the upper portion of the temple is disclosed. I was there before the dam was built; the excavators had begun to cut a stairway into the heart of a sphinx which was supposed to guard the gold. The government stopped the works, fearing that the construction would be undermined. So great is the pressure of the floods that a very little weakening would loose some stones in the masonry; then the waters would break through and sweep over the face of Egypt."

The idea began to grip me. In vain my reason forbade participation in Nikolai's enterprise; three days later we had reached Brindisi by the Overland Mail, crossed the Mediterranean and chartered a vessel for Assouan.

The tourist season was normally ended, for the heat had become intense; but traveling Americans, as we were considered, are proverbially eccentric, and our voyage to the region of the dam was not regarded with any suspicion by the authorities. Indeed, antiquities along each shore called forth archaeologists during all times and seasons. We developed an insatiable thirst for sarcophagi during the first day of our sojourn, and, having pitched a tent as near the great dam as was permitted, wandered freely in its neighborhood.

It was, indeed, a marvel of engineering work. Of solid masonry, thirty feet thick and fifty high, built in a slightly convex configuration, it stretched away on either side of us, connecting highland with highland. In front of it a little stream, formed by the overflow, ran sluggishly between banks fringed with green; but the desert ran clear to within a hundred feet of this verdure, and it seemed impossible that, at the word of the engineers, these parched, brown fields, with their still water-wheels and thin cotton plants, hardly in tiniest leaf, should become converted into fertile plains. But behind the monstrous masonry a seething flood of yellow waters bubbled and boiled, daily rising higher and pressing more fiercely against the walls. And here, as far as eye could reach, were waters that had hurled themselves from the unknown highlands of Abyssinia, to retire, baffled, before this stupendous handiwork of man.

Near to one bank of the river a granite column rose out of the seething flood. It was the buried temple, formerly high and dry above the plains, but now forever hidden under the waves. The flood was not yet at its height, and thus the summit was disclosed; during the greater portion of the year nothing of the temple was visible. In a light Arab skiff we explored the locality.

"Five feet beneath the surface of the waves," said my companion, pointing to the granite pile, "there lies the sealed opening which the excavators had made. The body of the temple is enormous, and the dam is actually contiguous with it at the bottom. Thus you can see that any serious excavations would affect the dam's own stability. Now, here is my plan. When the excavation was sealed, a sort of casson was made. Thus, if we pry the stones apart with a grappling instrument, and then descend in diving helmets, we can enter the casson, close the opening through which we have come, and afterward dig into the body of the temple itself without more than a small modicum of water entering."

I understood his point. It was on the principle of the caisson with airlocks adopted by our own bridge builders. There was an air chamber between the exterior and interior of the temple which could be closed to prevent the influx of water.

"Tonight the moon rises too early," said Nikolai. "But tomorrow we can row out with our instruments and effect our entrance. There is an air-shaft running straight down through the temple; once inside we can pursue our operations for three days or more, so long as we take a supply of food with us."

"And how shall we transport a million pounds—I think you said a millon, or a half-million—of gold?" I asked.

Nikolai looked confused. "Summers," he said, "please understand that in an adventure of this character one must lead and the other follow. I must exact a pledge of obedience, without questioning."

"Well, it was too late to withdraw now. I gave the pledge and, on the following night, having led our Arabs to believe that we intended to start upon a three-day duck shooting expedition, we put out from the shore, well provisioned; we pulled a mile or more up stream against a fearful current, and then drifted down quietly to where the granite summit of the buried temple rose adjacent to the mighty dam. We had brought oxygen helmets and grappling irons. We anchored the boat to the masonry, put on our helmets, which were equipped with an oxygen-producing chemical and so freed us from dependence upon an air-line, and let ourselves into the warm current. Then, hanging by one arm to the edge of the boat, we pried for long periods at the interstices of the temple masonry beneath the water. The work proved extremely arduous. Half a dozen times I was compelled to climb back into the boat and sit there, dripping and exhausted, while Nikolai worked indefatigably. At last he signaled to me.

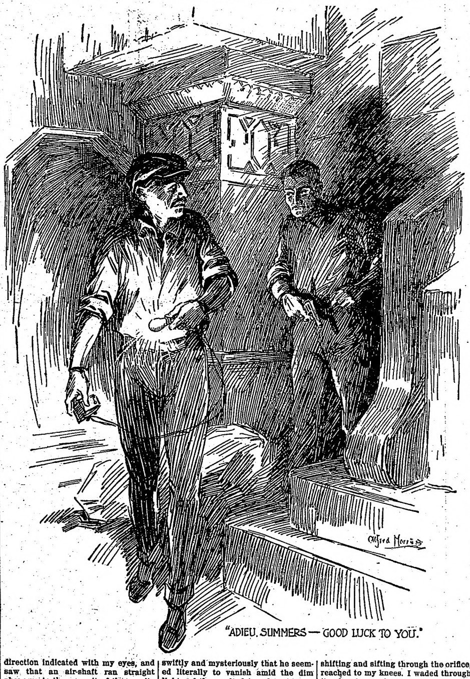
"I've loosened a brick," he whispered. "The rest will be easy." And he plied his iron until all at once he disappeared beneath the surface, to emerge exhausted but triumphant.

"Bring the rations," he said in a low voice. I took up the sealed can which I had purchased in Cairo. It contained a week's supply of a sort of meat biscuit, specially put up in sealed cans for travelers as a protection against the sand storms which penetrate paper as though it were muslin. We adjusted our helmets and dived under the water.

It was an eerie sensation, clinging to the smooth, weed-covered wall of the temple, peering through the helmet glasses to discover the opening. Nikolai gained a foothold and crawled through the orifice he had made. I followed him; and now we found ourselves in a small chamber made by the dam builders, exterior to the temple proper and about six feet by nine. The loosened bricks had been allowed to fall inward; we collected these and had soon closed the entrance. We were now in complete darkness and, of course, still under water. Nikolai groped against the inner wall until he found the ridges of the newly laid mortar. Ten minutes' work sufficed to loosen the first stone. Immediately the water poured forth into the interior of the temple—about ten baths' full—leaving us high, but by no means dry, within the temple. We had soon pried out an aperture large enough to enable us to crawl through, and cautiously descended a flight of low steps. All at once a brilliant light flashed out, and I saw Nikolai holding an electric light bulb, attached to a wire which was fastened round his body and evidently connected with some minute storage battery that he wore under his clothes. I removed my helmet as he did and looked around me.

We were standing at the bottom of a spacious passage cut into the solid rock—no, not at the bottom, for at the end of the passage a further flight of steps ran down apparently into the bottom of the earth. What arrested my attention was the singular freshness of the air and the freshness of the excavators' work also. The steps had been concreted, and the passages had apparently been blasted by skilled engineers.

As though divining my question, Nikolai pointed upward. I followed the direction indicated with my eyes, and saw that an air-shaft ran straight above us to the summit of the granite column, and at the top appeared the stars, apparently close at hand and exceedingly brilliant.



"ADIEU, SUMMERS — GOOD LUCK TO YOU."

"Now, Summers," said Nikolai, "we are in the approach of the temple, just where the German engineers blasted out the rock while searching for the sarcophagi. Let us descend to the temple proper."

We went cautiously along the passage and down a second flight. This turned and twisted in a curious manner; I counted forty-seven steps, and then suddenly the rock ceased beneath my feet and I trod upon sand. The tiny bulb hardly illuminated the vastness of the chamber in which we were standing. I came to a halt; Nikolai had halted and was looking at me irresolutely, a strange expression in his eyes. He pointed out into the gloom.

"Summers," he said, "I confess that I do not myself wholly remember the location of the tombs beneath which the treasure is believed to lie. We shall never, together, have time to explore this huge cavern and locate our quarry. It will be necessary to separate."

He looked at me searchingly, still in the same peculiar manner as before, trying to read my mind, as though dubious of my good faith.

"I will obey you, of course," I answered. "But if I get lost—"

"You will not get lost," he answered, still eyeing me gloomily. "I shall take this passage to the right; you will walk straight ahead. But tread softly."

"Why, who is there to overhear us in these solitudes?" I asked, and for the first time the suspicion flashed across my mind that the excitement of the adventure had bereft him of his senses.

I saw his brows gather together in an ominous frown. Then he placed his hand to his pocket, withdrew it—and I saw a revolver shining. He had never threatened me before.

"You will proceed ahead," he said, handing me the bulb of the electric light. He detached the wire from his body, pulling out after it a small pocket-battery. "This is charged for two hours longer. If at the expiration of that time you have not found the tombs, return. If you have found them, wait for me. Beneath the king's tomb lies the treasure; it had hardly been located before the government sealed the vault. Adieu, Summers—good luck to you."

I turned away unsteadily and proceeded on my path, the tiny light, although it lit my way, merely intensifying the darkness of the vault, in which my footfalls gave forth cavernous echoes. I had gone but a few steps when Nikolai ran after me.

"Forgive me if I have been hasty," he said, "but this adventure is more perilous than you know. I change my instructions. If you find the treasure tomb, note its location and return. If you do not find me here, ascend the stairs and re-enter the boat."

He pressed my hand, and, while I still gaped at him, he disappeared so swiftly and mysteriously that he seemed literally to vanish amid the dim lights of the vaulted temple. After a moment of indecision I started off in the direction which had been assigned to me. Tortured as I was by hideous doubts, I would not let my fancy dwell upon the most sinister of all that came to me—the thought that it was Nikolai's intention to return and leave me to all purposes buried alive in that dreadful place. And yet I knew that should he pass through the air chamber without sealing the inner door, the rush of water would flood even that vast cavern and inevitably drown me.

I wandered on and on. The distance seemed impossible; I must have been walking for fifteen minutes before I came to a halt. Before me the vault still stretched away, apparently endless. Had I been walking in a circle, or was I pursuing a course straight through the bowels of the earth? Strangely enough, the air remained pure, though there was now no opening above me. At last, finding no tomb, nothing but this eternal passage among the shadows, with the wall of rock upon my right hand and the immeasurable space upon my left, I sat down and rested.

I must have dozed, for I seemed to be standing among the graves of the dead, violated by vandals of the last century. I saw the mummied kings surround me; their eyes were open and they gazed upon me terribly as one who had come to desecrate their already rifled tombs. I awoke shuddering, feeling the sweat stream down over my face. And, as I did so, I heard very faintly and far away, the sound of pistol shots.

Then panic overcame me. I was completely unnerved by the experiences of that dreadful night. It seemed as though my companion had sustained my spirits by the effusion of his own hypnotic personality. Now that he was gone, I felt my courage ooze out of my finger-tips and quivering knees. I sprang to my feet and ran, on, on, blindly, desperately, through the darkness. Luckily the course was clear, and the brave little light, which I had fastened to my belt, lit up the rock wall and the sandy floor. Breathless, exhausted, I ran on, till all at once, without warning, the light went out. I was in utter darkness.

I sank down upon my knees and covered my head with my hands. I fell into a sort of coma, and waited, unable to stir a hand or foot, for some inevitable disaster.

When at last I raised my head again I was amazed to see, far in front of me, the faintest, tiniest light. But what inspired new hope in me was the fact that this was no electric light or any other artificial illumination, but the light of day!

I rose and, groping my way with my hands outstretched against the rocky wall, I began to stumble on toward it. Soon there was no further room for doubt. It was daylight, penetrating through a low cavern of rock. The sand grew deeper under my feet. Now I could feel the cool morning breeze upon my face, and the sand, shifting and sifting through the orifice, reached to my knees. I waded through it, plunging and falling, until I trod upon firmer ground. Some desert grasses and other hardy plants had drifted in and taken root in it, affording a foothold. The tunnel grew smaller. With hands extended over my head I could touch the roof; now I was in the light of day—and at last I sank gasping upon the ground outside.

I looked round me in amazement. I was lying upon the summit of a rock acclivity which I had noted during the preceding day some half a mile behind our camp upon the banks of the stream. But where the stream had dwindled between its low banks there was now a rushing flood of turbulent waters. And where the summit of the granite temple had reared itself above the dam there now appeared the temple itself, with the majestic, calm statues of the Ptolemies that none had ever thought to see again. And where the mighty dam had arched itself from bank to bank, there were two masses of masonry, and between them rubble and shapeless stones, over which swirled and tossed and plunged the freed torrents of the Nile.

The dam was broken. On either side of the river banks there stretched swamps of black mud, through which the tide was oozing and creeping, inch by inch, up to the deserted water-wheels. And from the Arab villages on either side came white-robed figures, with arms raised above their heads, chanting their thanks to Allah that the Nile was again to give fertility to their fields.

I made my way slowly toward the site of the camp. The tents had been swept away, with all our outfit. I looked for Nikolai; he was not there. But a figure ran up to me, shrieking and gibbering. It was Mohammed, our head-man. He pointed to the roaring torrent.

Caught fast among the broken piers, twisted and battered into a shapeless thing, was the boat. Mohammed had thought that the swift floods had dashed us to destruction; he looked on me as one risen from the dead.

I waited three days upon the shore, but nothing of Nikolai did I see then or ever again. It was not until I reached London that the mystery was solved by a letter, which I found awaiting me. It was dated from our camp, the day before we had started on our expedition.

"I must confess, Summers," it ran, "that I intend to deceive you as to the nature of our expedition tomorrow. Needless to say, there is no treasure buried beneath the 'Temple of the Kings.' In fact, I shall not take you into the temple at all. We cannot enter it.

"It is necessary for my purposes that the great dam be destroyed. From secret plans I have discovered the entrance to the base of the construction where the masonry is under the strongest pressure. A man sits constantly on guard; he must be disposed of and a charge of dynamite applied.

"I regret to say, Summers, that, while your services have proved most useful in a subordinate capacity, you have shown yourself somewhat lacking in the capacity and courage to carry out bolder plans. Hence this subterfuge of the buried treasure and the secret vault. The vault which you will see, will not be that of the temple, but actually the subterranean portion of the dam foundations.

"If I escape, we shall not meet again. The arm of England is long, and I have no desire to be hampered with one whom I cannot rely upon in emergencies, or who is fettered by scruples. But if you desire a reason for my destruction of the dam, watch the newspapers."

I seized the newspaper of the day. And suddenly I understood. September cotton had fallen to fifteen. The loosening of the floods had irrigated the Egyptian fields and broken the Chicago corner. And this was the secret of Nikolai's desperate and successful scheme.

I have often wondered whether he escaped from the destruction, whether the pistol shots I heard signaled the death of the watchman only or of himself also. And I have hoped he knew of the secret entrance to the vault—that he did not mean to leave me to perish in the darkness of that subterranean prison. But that part of the mystery will never be solved—at least, unless I meet Nikolai again.

PASSED THE CENTURY MARK

Sickly Boy, Expecting Early Death, Lived to Be Oldest Clergyman in Great Britain.

Believed to have such a slender hold on life that he was christened when two days old, Philip Carlyon lived to be the oldest clergyman in Great Britain. He died recently at Pennance House, Falmouth, within six weeks of his one hundred and second birthday. He was ordained in 1836 and retired at the age of seventy.

Mr. Carlyon possessed remarkable vitality until within a short period of his death, taking long walks and attending church regularly. He remembered his father lighting a bonfire on receipt of the news of the Battle of Waterloo and was terribly frightened when an effigy of Bonaparte was thrown into the flames, thinking it was a real man.

On three occasions he narrowly escaped a violent death. The first was when as a boy of six he was carried out to sea while bathing, being rescued just in time by his uncle. In 1833 he had a thrilling adventure while climbing Ben Cruachan and came within an ace of death. His third escape was on a narrow railway cutting, a jump sideways saving him by inches only from being run down by a train.

Mr. Carlyon's youngest brother died at the age of ninety-two.—From the London Chronicle.

Brains and Housework.

"The business man who runs his office as the average woman does her kitchen work soon finds himself not only left behind, but his mentality has become so inelastic that, when he finally does wake up to things, he finds it next to impossible to adapt himself to the new order.

"You women must use your minds in your work. Use it to short-cut your steps; use it to increase the quality and decrease the effort. Above all, get away from that pernicious idea that 'kitchen work is drudgery.' So is office work, if a man allows it to work on him, instead of working it.—Countryside Magazine.

Women Discard Bird's Plumage.

The plumage of birds for headgear decoration is being abandoned by women, says Colonel Joseph H. Acklenn of Nashville, Tenn., who arrived in Washington recently, to assume his duties as chief warden of the United States to enforce the recently enacted migratory bird protection law. Colonel Acklen, who is an enthusiastic bird lover, is to serve the government without pay. The change in feminine fashions and the gradual abandonmnt of fur and feathers in the decoration of women's hats, the colonel believes, is the most hopeful sign he has seen in his work thus far,

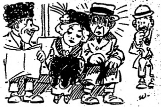
HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Just a Little Incident of Real Life in 'Frisco

SAN FRANCISCO.—Little incidents of real life, as this one was, provide entertainment for the most blase of crowds. And the mere fact that a crowd of theatergoers bound to their homes in the Richmond district were of this sort did not in the least keep them from chuckling to themselves quite as animatedly as the shoe store clerk who was on the same car.



Near the downtown terminal the car had been boarded by a winsome little lass of the "interesting" age, whose real blonde hair she had allowed to become mussed while working over some dry-as-dust matters in the office where she was employed. She wasn't used to being out that late, this could be seen at a glance, for before she had been in the car five minutes her head sank to one side, her eyes closed and she slipped off into dreamland.

Beside her was a stalwart young man who gazed with some consternation and embarrassment at the slowly approaching head of the girl next to him. Just then the car gave a lurch, and, without awakening, the girl allowed her head to tilt farther and farther until at length it was resting snugly on the young man's shoulder.

Now this young man didn't belong to the girl, and the girl didn't belong to the young man, and by the youth's actions this fact was as plain as day. He squirmed and looked uncomfortable, perspired and mopped his brow, and half rose when the name of his street was called, only to lean back again with a groan.

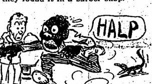
The passengers chuckled, smiled and then giggled outright, while the young man darted daggerlike glances of annihilation about him.

At length the martyr could stand it no longer. He had already gone three blocks past his stopping place, and human endurance has its limitations. With a gentle shove he set upright the cause of all his troubles, and rushed down the aisle toward the car door, while two blonde hairs trailing out behind his black suit changed the giggles into a roar of laughter that verily shook the car.

Alligator in Gas Heater; Porter Breaks Record

ATLANTA, GA.—And the puzzling thing about it is, How did it manage to get there? It's an alligator, an honest-to-goodness alligator, a baby thing with tail and head and jaws like a lizard, and they found it in a barber shop.

The shop is operated by L. M. Brady. Tom Echols, who shines shoes while he isn't sweeping out, went back to light the instantaneous heater for a customer who was going to take a bath, and as the gas flared up something leaped from the tank, sprawled upon the floor and commenced kicking about.



Echols, who is black and superstitious as well as easily frightened, darted for the street. He made the distance in time that amounted to just a little bit less than nothing, screaming and striking terror to the souls of a half dozen customers and fully that many barbers.

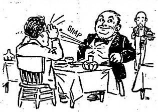
Upon investigation Brady discovered an alligator crawling forlornly beneath the gas tank. It measured about six inches in length, and was the size of an overgrown north Georgia lizard. It was the "hellbender" size, to use a scientific term, and can be carried in the hand or pocket with safety.

How the thing managed to get into the Marietta street barber shop is a scientific mystery.

Some say the sun absorbed it with an amount of water from the flow of the Nile, away over there in Egypt, carried it in the clouds to Atlanta.

Fat Man's Sigh Bursts Button, Blinding Diner

PITTSBURGH.—Sighing with contentment after he had finished an excellent dinner, J. E. Jones, a wealthy real estate man, weighing 250 pounds, forced a button from his waistcoat with such force that it split in two. One of the pieces struck in the eye his friend, Christopher Smith, with whom he was dining, probably destroying the sight. The other piece caught Mr. Smith on the cheek and opened up a deep wound, which required three stitches to close.



Mr. Jones now admits that it is not always wise to express with a sigh one's satisfaction over a fine meal, especially if one be of wide girth.

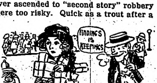
Mr. Jones and Mr. Smith had just finished dining in a Diamond street restaurant when the accident happened. After the repast was finished they had settled themselves back for a smoke, when Mr. Jones heaved the momentous sigh. There was a snap and before Mr. Jones realized what had happened there was a wound under his companion's left eye, while the eye itself was tightly closed in pain.

Medical attention disclosed the fact that Mr. Smith will probably lose the sight of his left eye.

Mr. Jones is a member of the Academy of Science and Art. He is prominent in business circles.

Picking Up a Living on the Streets of Gotham

NEW YORK.—He was a charter member of the Amalgamated Associates Who Get a Living Without Work. He never ascended to "second story" robbery or descended to pocket picking. Both were too risky. Quick as a trout after a fly, slippery as an eel just out of Hudson river mud, and with sight as alert as that of a crab after carrion on the river bottom, he skims the tidal flow of New York's shopping eddies and gathers in what he may.



That gathering is good when all New York is shopping—shopping strenuously—but tethered helplessly with its skirts so tightly wrapped about its legs that to stoop over and pick up a dropped parcel is a physical proposition that must be passed up. Handbags will pop open, particularly if properly pressed by an adept. That helps when business has been bad with the accumulator of unconsidered trifles.

"I literally pick up a living, and an honest one," he explained, when asked why he did not return a bundle to its owner, instead of trying to get it into his pocket unobserved. "Findings is keepings, I was taught when I was a kid, but I always advertise them first—if they're worth it. Good rewards you get sometimes. If I make a good find around the big hotels and it's advertised, especially when it says, 'No questions asked,' and it's a watch or jewel that's listed in all the pawnshops, I return it."

It turned out that the accumulator had been an exercise boy in a racing stable, steering suckers against handbooks and capper at auction rooms.

CROWN PRINCE STUDIES WAR PLANS

The exile of Dantzic, Crown Prince Frederick William, is back in Berlin, after two years at the head of his Death's Head hussars. He comes to Berlin to study war plans and administration under the guidance of the able soldiers of the general staff. He could not have come at a better time if he really desires to work and learn. Preparations for increasing the army under the terms of last year's armament bills are well under way, and the staff is loaded with work of a highly practical executive nature.

The crown prince will probably not stay at Berlin long. He will be instructed by past masters in strategy, the mobilization of troops, in all that can be taught from maps at a desk. Then he will be sent to some other regiment to take up again the practical work of soldiering. By inclination as well as training, young Frederick William appears to be a thorough soldier. He may find himself some day in a position where he will have to use his knowledge of the war game. There are many reasons to be apprehensive of this, although the horizon is now fairly clear. War clouds roll up quickly in Europe. In the formal phrase of democracy, Germany's relations with all other powers are just now "correct."

RECEIVER OF THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Mr. Walker W. Vick of New Jersey, general receiver of the Dominican customs for Uncle Sam, has just rendered the sixth annual report of the receivership. A summary of the report shows that big business at the Dominican capital showed some trepidation when President Wilson brought about a change of administration of custom affairs in Santo Domingo. They feared the new broom might sweep too clean.

As the new receivership administration gradually unfolded its purpose, however, there was a natural subsidence of concern within business circles, and now the conclusion is in all realms of Dominican financial and commercial circles, that the right kind of sweeping has a salutary effect on the financial, as it does on the domestic household, and that cobwebs of debatable precedents are not always conducive to forceful achievement. When what is known as the "American-Dominican convention of 1907" was created, the United States accepted the responsibility of receiving all the customs duties; to pay a definite proportion of the same each month to the Republic, and to apply all else in payment of interest on a $20,000,000 bonded debt and into a sinking fund for the discharge of the principal.

During the six years of this Dominican receivership great progress has been made toward the repayment of the principal of the $20,000,000 loan, the customs receipts climbing from about $2,000,000 a year to an annual total customs receipts for the calendar year 1913 of over $4,000,000, or, to be exact, $4,290,000.

AWARDED RED CROSS GOLD MEDAL

A woman with white hair and with the spirit of perennial youthfulness and enthusiasm shining from her face has been awarded the Red Cross gold medal of merit by the central board of that organization. The woman thus honored is Miss Jane A. Delano. President Wilson made the award of the medal. In presenting Miss Delano to the president, Miss Mabel T. Boardman, the active head of the American Red Cross society, said of her:

"It is due to Miss Delano's devoted and efficient labors that a splendid corps of over 4,000 of the best trained nurses in the country have been enrolled in the Red Cross for active service in time of war or disaster. The people of the United States may well be grateful for the unremunerated and efficient work of this devoted woman."

The practicability of the remarkable organization effected by Miss Delano, whose official title is chairman of the national committee on Red Cross nursing service, has many times been tested. Last spring, for instance, during the Ohio flood, Miss Delano and her coworkers were able to mobilize within a few hours' time an efficient corps of trained nurses to assist in the relief work, and the Red Cross can at all times secure through its 110 local committees on nursing service the number of nurses required in disaster or war.

OFFERED POST AT PRINCETON

Alfred Noyes, the English poet, who is in this country lecturing in the cause of world peace, has been asked to join the faculty of Princeton university, and it is understood that he has agreed to accept. His election, it is said, will be sanctioned by the trustees at their meeting in April.

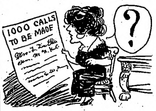
The position which Mr. Noyes is to fill, it is said, is a visiting professorship, with lectures on modern English literature. It will begin about the middle of next February and extend through the second term of the university, and, it is understood, will continue in this way for several years, from February to June.

Mr. Noyes is thirty-three years old, and has been writing poetry for more than 20 years. At the age of fourteen, he wrote his first epic, a production in rhymed verse of several thousand lines, describing allegorically the voyage through life as on a ship. This poem was not published. Five years later "The Symbolist" was printed in the weekly supplement of the London Times.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Capital Calling System Is Revamped by Women

WASHINGTON.—Women in official society circles met here the other day and discussed the national capital's complex calling system with a view to evolving a simpler and more satisfactory method of exchange of the formal call. The meeting was held at the Congressional club in response to a call by Mrs. Duncan U. Fletcher, its president.



Former Ambassador Henry White, who served on diplomatic missions to London, Paris, Rome and other European capitals, told of social obligations as he had observed them abroad.

Among those in attendance were Mrs. Marshall, wife of the vice-president; Mrs. Bryan, wife of the secretary of state; Mrs. White, wife of the chief justice of the Supreme court, wives of cabinet officers and others.

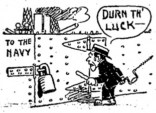
Mrs. Fletcher voiced the sentiment of those present by declaring the necessity for a simpler calling system was imperative. Everybody, she said, wants to return every call that is made upon them, but there is a limit of hours in the day and days in the week.

"On her first afternoon at home," said Mrs. Fletcher, "Mrs. Marshall had a thousand calls and they have averaged between 300 and 500 each Wednesday since. Her sincere effort to return every call has been the comment and admiration of all Washington society, but how can anybody return in person several thousand calls in one season? Mrs. Marsall's experience is in greater or less degree duplicated by every official hostess in Washington."

The question of simplifying formal calling in Washington has been growing more acute during the last ten years, but this meeting was the first attempt at simplification.

American Youth Scramble for Places in Navy

IT takes a "jimmy" these days to break into the United States navy as a plain, ordinary seaman; a stick of dynamite is necessary to get in as an apprentice or yeoman. The navy department and its recruiting stations have "waiting lists" containing hundreds of names of young, husky youths "hankering" to go to sea.



The full, active membership of the navy is limited by law to 51,500 men, and there are that many enlisted men now on the pay rolls. For the first time since the Civil war the full quota of men allowed by law has been enlisted.

The bars as to fitness have not been let down, and no men with physical or mental defects have been enlisted, but there has been good advertising. The tales of the cruises and the details of the chances for obtaining an education, sent out in pamphlet form, have swelled the ranks so that the bars had to be put up.

The greatest number of monthly enlistments, except in war time, was made in the last six months since Secretary Daniels began his revolutionary reforms in the navy.

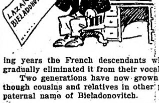
Perhaps the chief cause for the great influx of fine, hardy young men into the naval service in the last few months was the recent Mediterranean cruise of the great Atlantic fleet.

This cruise was a regular pleasure trip for the young seamen, and it was intended that it should be such by the navy department. Long stops were made at all the principal cities on the Mediterranean, where shore leave was given. At the different seaports the American sailors were entertained in lavish style by naval and civic organizations, and in every way shown a general good time.

Tales of cruises contained in letters sent back to friends from foreign ports also fire the imagination of young friends "back home." For instance, the recruits at the Chicago training station were recently sent overland to Bremerton, Wash. They were allowed a stop-over at Yellowstone park, and other interesting places.. Soon after arriving at Bremerton they were assigned to the cruiser New Orleans, which sailed for Mexican waters.

Believes There Is a Good Deal in Some Names

MR. LADISLAS LAZARO, representative from the Seventh Louisiana district and successor to Arsene Pujo, head of the now famous "money trust" investigating committee, believes there is a good deal in a name when it comes to running for congress. Dr. Lazaro is fairly well satisfied that had he run for office under the patronymic of his grandfather he would have been defeated before his friends and neighbors could have mastered the name of their candidate.



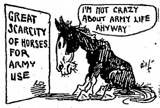
LAZARO BIELADONOVITCH
A NAME LIKE THAT WOULD DEFEAT A MAN EVERY TIME—

The new congressman's real name is Lazaro Bieladonovitch, although he has gone into the records of congress as Mr. Lazaro. His grandfather, a Russian, went to Louisiana with the unpronounceable name, but in succeeding years the French descendants who became his friends and associates gradually eliminated it from their vocabulary and called him Lazaro.

Two generations have now grown up in Louisiana under that name, although cousins and relatives in other parts of the United States still use the paternal name of Bieladonovitch.

Discuss the Increasing Scarcity of Army Horses

THERE has been recently a discussion going on among the army and navy men on the increasing scarcity of army horses. The army quartermasters, who have to do with the purchasing of horses for military establishments, say that there is really an alarming scarcity of good animals. Of course, it is well known that the war department is more or less hampered by the fact that congress has not appropriated sufficient money to enable the quartermaster's department to acquire horses in sufficient number to supply all the mounted commands. Consequently there is a shortage in horses caused by the distribution of troops on the border and elsewhere and by the increase of war strength of troops serving abroad. There are not enough horses now to supply the commands at peace strength.



GREAT SCARCITY OF HORSES FOR ARMY USE
I'M NOT CRAZY ABOUT ARMY LIFE ANYWAY

If there were to come an emergency calling for a large number of horses the war department would have great difficulty in getting them. It is said that one reason for the scarcity of horses is the falling off of the product of those who are raising horses. It is unofficially declared that the increased use of automobiles has had its influence on the rearing of horses, despite the assertions to the contrary.

The motor trucks also seriously affect the market for draft animals, but that has to do mostly with the mule, so far as the army is concerned. The mule will always be a necessity, despite the improvement which has been made in the motor trucks.

WILSON ANALYZES SELF TO PRESS MEN

President Tells What Office Means to Him.

SIZE OF TASK TREMENDOUS

Chief Executive Finds Pose of Dignity Irksome and Declares When Term Is Over He Will Visit Washington on Sightseeing Tour.

Washington, March 23.—Woodrow Wilson unbosomed himself to the members of the National Press club of Washington Friday, telling them in a frank, conversational way how he felt as president of the United States; how difficult it was for him to imagine himself as the chief executive with the formal amenities of the position, and how he had struggled to be as free as the ordinary individual without the restraints of his office.

It was an intimate picture of Woodrow Wilson—the man—drawn by himself, on the occasion of the "housewarming" at the Press club's new quarters.

The president did not intend to have his remarks reported, but later, at the request of the club, the speech was made public.

Wilson, as He Sees Himself.

"I was just thinking of my sense of confusion of identity sometimes when I read articles about myself," the president said. "I have never read an article about myself in which I recognized myself, and I have come to have the impression that I must be some kind of a fraud, because I think a great many of these articles are written in absolute good faith.

"I tremble to think of the variety and falseness in the impressions I make—and it is being borne in on me so that it may change my very disposition—that I am a cold and removed person who has a thinking machine inside which he adjusts to the circumstances—which he does not allow to be moved by any winds of affection or emotion of any kind—but turns like a cold searchlight on anything that is presented to his attention and makes it work.

Feels Responsibility Keenly.

"I am not aware of having any detachable apparatus inside of me. On the contrary, if I were to interpret myself, I would say that my constant embarrassment is to retain the emotions that are inside of me.

"You may not believe it, but I sometimes feel like a fire from a far from extinct volcano, and if the lava does not seem to spill over it is because you are not high enough to see into the basin and see the caldron boil. Because, truly, gentlemen, in the position which I occupy there is a sort of—I do not know how else to express it than to say—passionate sense of being connected with my fellow men in a peculiar relationship of responsibility of office, but God knows there are enough things in this world that need to be corrected.

Fear He'll Disappoint People.

"I have mixed first and last with all sorts and conditions of men—there are mighty few kinds of men that have to be described to me, and there are mighty few kinds of experiences that have to be described to me—and when I think of the number of men who are looking to me as the representative of a party, with the hope for all varieties of salvation from the things they are struggling in the midst of, it makes me tremble.

"It makes me tremble not only with a sense of my own inadequacy and weakness, but as if I were shaken by the very things that are shaking them, and if I seem circumspect it is because I am so diligently trying not to make any colossal blunders.

"If you just calculated the number of blunders a fellow can make in 24 hours if he is not careful and if he does not listen more than he talks, you would see something of the feeling that I have.

Always Eager to Get Advice.

"I was amused the other day at a remark that Senator Newlands made. I had read him the trust message that I was to deliver to congress some ten days before I delivered it, and I never stop 'doctoring' things of that kind until the day I have to deliver them.

"When he heard it read to congress he said: 'I think it was better than it was when you read it to me.' I said: 'Senator, there is one thing which I do not think you understand. I not only use all the brains I have, but all I can borrow, and I have borrowed a lot since I read it to you first.'

"That, I dare say, is what gives the impression of circumspectness. I am listening; I am diligently trying to collect all the brains that are borrowable in order that I may not make more blunders than it is inevitable that a man should make who has great limitations of knowledge and capacity. And the emotion of the thing is so great that I suppose I must be some kind of a mask to conceal it.

Often Feels He's Masquerading.

"I really feel sometimes as if I were masquerading when I catch a picture of myself in some printed description.

"In between things that I have to do as a public officer I never think of myself as the president of the United States, because I never have had any sense of being identified with that office.

"I feel like a person appointed for a certain length of time to administer that office, and I feel just as much outside of it at this moment as I did before I was elected to it. I feel just as much outside of it as I still feel outside of the government of the United States.

"No man could imagine himself the government of the United States; but he could understand that some part of his fellow citizens had told him to go and run a certain part of it the best he knew how.

"That would not make him the government itself or the thing itself. It would just make him responsible for running it the best he knew how.

Office So Great; Man So Small.

"The machine is so much greater than himself, the office is so much greater than himself; the office is so much greater than he can ever be, and the most he can do is to look grave enough and self-possessed enough to seem to fill it.

"I can hardly refrain every now and again from tipping the public the wink, as much as to say, 'It is only me that is inside this thing. I know that I will have to get out presently. I know that then I will look just my own proper size, and that for the time being the proportions are somewhat refracted and misrepresented to the eye by the large thing I am inside of, from which I am tipping you this wink.'

"For example, take matters of this sort. I will not say whether it is wise or unwise; simple or grave, but certain precedents have been established that in certain companies the president must leave the room first and people must give way to him. They must not sit down if he is standing up.

Finds Customs Embarrassing.

"It is a very uncomfortable thing to have to think of all the other people every time I get up and sit down, and all that sort of thing. So when I get guests in my own house and the public is shut out, I adjourn being president and take leave to be a gentleman. If they draw back and insist upon my doing something first I firmly decline.

"There are blessed intervals when I forget by one means or another that I am president of the United States. One means by which I forget is to get a rattling good detective story, get after some imaginary offender, and chase him all over—preferably any continent but this—because the various parts of this continent are becoming painfully suggestive to me.

"The postoffices and many other things which stir reminiscences have 'sicklied them o'er with a pale cast of thought.' There are postoffices to which I wouldn't think of mailing a letter, which I can't think of without trembling with the knowledge of the heartburnings of the struggle there was in connection with getting somebody installed as postmaster.

Knows Little of Capital Sights.

"Now, if I were free, I would come not infrequently up to these rooms. You know I never was in Washington but a very few hours until I came last year and I never expect to see the inside of the public buildings in Washington until my term is over.

"The minute I turn up anywhere, I am personally conducted to beat the band. The curator, and the assistant curators, and every other blooming official turns up, and they show me so much attention that I don't see the building. I would have to say, 'Stand aside and let me see what you are showing me.'

"Some day, after I am through with this office, I am going to come back to Washington and see it. In the meantime, I am in the same category as the National museum, the monument, the Smithsonian institution, or the Congressional library, and everything that comes down here has to be shown the president.

"If I only knew an exhibition appearance to assume—apparently other appearances that do not show what is going on inside—I would like to have it pointed out, so that I could practise it before the looking glass and see if I could not look like the monument.

"Being regarded as a national exhibit, it would be much simpler than being shaken hands with by the whole United States. And yet, even that is interesting to me, simply because I like human beings.

"It is a pretty poor crowd that does not interest you. I think they would have to be all members of that class that devotes itself to 'expense regardless of pleasure' in order to be entirely uninteresting. These look so much alike—spend their time trying to look so much alike—and so relieve themselves of all responsibility of thought—that they are very monotonous indeed to look at! whereas a crowd picked up off the street is just a jolly lot—a job lot of real human beings, pulsating with life, with all kinds of passions and desires.

Plain Citizen, His Ambition.

"It would be a great pleasure if, unserved and unattended, I could be knocked around as I have been accustomed to be knocked around all my life; if I could resort to any delightful quarter, to any place in Washington that I chose. I have sometimes thought of going to some costumer—some theatrical costumer—and buying an assortment of beards, rouge, coloring, and all the known means of disguising myself, if it were not against the law. You see, I have a scruple as president against breaking the law and disguising one's self is against the law.

"But if I could disguise myself and not get caught I would go out, be a free American citizen once more, and have a jolly time. I might then meet some of you gentlemen and actually tell you what I really thought."

ULSTER SITUATION IS CAUSING MUTINY

SEVERAL OFFICERS RESIGN AND SOME TROOPS BALK AT MARCH ORDERS.

SOLDIERS OVERRUN PROVINCE

Large Armed Forces Occupy Every City In Attempt to Crush Opposition to Home Rule.—Unionists Quiet As Yet.

Ulster Defense Ready.

Belfast.—While representatives of both the British government and the Ulster party insist that the situation is easier, the reports or resignations of army officers are confirmed, and the officers of the Ulster army continue military preparations. Uniforms were to be issued today to the special service corps of 4,000 men. This corps is composed chiefly of old soldiers and sharpshooters and it will be Ulster's chief reliance in the first attack, if hostilities are begun. The corps is designed as a mobile striking force.

London, March 23.—A mutiny of two companies of the Dorsetshire regiment stationed in Belfast is reported by the Pall Mall Gazette. The message says: "When the men of the First batalion of the Dorsetshire regiment were paraded in Belfast and notified that they were being transferred elsewhere, they threw down their arms. A sergeant stepped forward, saluted the officers, and said: 'We will have no home rule here.'" This is thought in some quarters to be an exaggerated version of the reports of unrest among the regular troops in Ulster.

Dissatisfaction Is Seen.

The outstanding feature of the news from Ireland, however, was the dissatisfaction among the officers of the regular army under orders to proceed to Ulster with their regiments.

Ahe actual number of resignations among them were problematical, although it was reported that 100 officers of the Curragh camp have offered their resignations. That the situation is serious is evident from the earnest consultations of cabinet ministers regarding the best plans of counteracting the movement.

The actual fact of this disaffection is the more discomforting to the military authorities since the army is already seriously short of commissioned officers.

Threats of a crisis in the army if a movement of regular troops was undertaken against Ulster had long been current.

A Martial Aspect.

Belfast, Ireland.—Ulster presents a martial aspect. All the towns are occupied by soldiers of the regular army, and other detachments are marching along country roads, with long trains of baggage and ammunition carts, on their way to strengthen the various garrisons. In the meanwhile, at all unionist centers, there is great animation among the "Ulster volunteers." Throughout the province a feeling of intense excitement prevails, and everybody seems waiting in anxious expectation for something to occur—they know not what.

Within twenty-four hours over 3,000 regular troops, including four battalions of infantry, with machine guns and two batteries of field artillery, all equipped for active service, arrived in the various towns of Ulster.

These troops form the advance guard of a large armed force which the military authorities are sending to the northern provinces of Ireland to prevent the assumption of local government by anti-home rulers.

Still more troops are on the way to the north from the local military camp at Curragh and from other army stations.

No Public Demonstrations.

The sudden preparations by the war office thus far have not created any public demonstration in Belfast. The leaders of the so-called unionist provisional government, however, await their anxiety lest their overenthusiastic followers precipitate riots giving their opponents the sought-for opportunity for enforcing rigorous repressive measures.

Sir Edward Carson, the Ulster Unionist leader, and his lieutenants desire the government to take the first provocative step. Sir Edward realizing the great need of preventing an undisciplined outbreak, as protest against all these troop movements again urged the Ulstermen to keep cool.

For Ambassador to Russia.

Washington, March 23.—That President Wilson has practically decided to name Representative Sharp of Ohio as ambassador to Russia in place of Henry M. Pindell, resigned, is the opinion at the White House.

G. N. Man to Denver Road.

Portland, Ore., March 23.—Word was received here that J. Russell, general superintendent of the Great Northern lines, west of Troy, Mont., with headquarters at Seattle, has been appointed general manager of the Denver & Rio Grande, with headquarters at Denver. Russell was for years head of the operating department of the Hill lines in Oregon and became general superintendent of the Great Northern on Jan. 1, last. His appointment is effective April 1.

BANK BANDIT KILLED; 3 HURT

FIVE HUNDRED SHOTS EXCHANGED IN GUN BATTLE.

Robber Had Very Coolly Driven Cashier Into Vault and Walked Off With $1,200.

Shawnee, Okla., March 23.—In a fight with a sheriff's posse near here Jose Patterson, who, it is charged, robbed the State Bank of Newalla, Okla., of $1,200, was shot and killed, and Chas. Hawk, chief of police of Shawnee, and Frank Timmons, a deputy sheriff, were wounded.

H. C. Hulse, a farmer, who was a member of the posse, also received slight wounds. The money was not recovered.

Patterson, a native of Newalla, returned there after an absence of years, and walked into the state bank. Burt Braley, the cashier, knew him and spoke to him as he entered. For answer, Patterson covered the cashier with a revolver and ordered him to "get into the vault quick."

As the door closed behind the official, Patterson reached into the cash drawer and took $1,200. Then he walked out and through the main section of town.

It was two hours before the cashier could get out of the vault and give the alarm. Then a posse was organized and pursued Patterson to the thick timber near the town. He made little effort to conceal himself from the posse.

"Come on and fight," he shouted, from behind a barricade of fallen trees.

The fight lasted three hours and 500 shots were exchanged. Patterson saved his ammunition, using it only when a member of the posse came too close. He fell with a bullet from the rifle of Deputy Timmons.

When Patterson's clothing was searched only $3 was found. It is believed he buried the money.

Escape of Alleged Swindler an Issue Since Shooting of Editor Calmette.

Paris, March 23.—Two former premiers of France Joseph Caillaux and Ernest Monis, and the chief public prosecutor of the republic, Victor Fabre, were questioned by a parliamentary committee concerning their acts and their motives in hindering the trial of the banker, Henri Rochette, who, it is averred, duped investors out of $3,000,000, and ultimately escaped punishment.

The death of Gaston Calmette, editor of the Figaro, at the hands of Mme. Caillaux caused this secret page in the judicial history of the country to be reopened.

While M. Caillaux, restless and with an air of suppressed passion, replied to the questions put to him by the members of the committee, the bells for M. Calmette's funeral were tolling. Almost all the notable literary and dramatic personages in Paris either were in the church of Saint Francis de Sales for the funeral service or followed the hearse to the cemetery.

HIRES MEN TO SPEND MONEY

Indianan Who Inherits $7,000,000 Wants Friends to Share His Riches.

Hammond, Ind., March 23.—Receiving a letter from Greece that he is heir to a $7,000,000 estate, Mathias Constante, a steel worker here, has hired five close friends at $5,000 a year apiece to help him spend his money. That is all they will have to do. Word of the estate came to Constante this week. He obtained credit for everything he wanted and exclaimed as he read the letter: "What will I ever do with so much money?"

When he went to work at $1.75 per diem he told his five warm friends of his luck. They accepted his offer to go all over the world with him and help him spend his money. The six are celebrating. They left for Chicago and the police predict that they will land in jail.

Invalids Take Music Cure.

Baltimore, Md., March 23.—Before the assembled patients of the Phipps psychiatric clinic of the Johns Hopkins hospital a string trio rendered a program of chamber music as part of the curative treatment by the clinic to cure mental disorders. The doctors have found this an effective means of taking the patients' minds off their illness. There are many pianolas, music boxes, and phonographs in the building.

Canal Action Deferred.

Washington, March 23.—Consideration of the bill to repeal the toll exemption provision of the Panama canal act will not be undertaken by the senate committee on inter-oceanic canals for several days, despite efforts of Democratic senators who favor the repeal to hurry action.

President Unbosoms Himself.

Washington, March 23.—Woodrow Wilson unbosomed himself to the members of the National Press club, telling them in a conversational way how he felt as president of the United States, how difficult it was for him to imagine himself as the chief executive with the formal amenities of the position, and how he had struggled to be as free as the ordinary individual without the restraints of his office. REBELS ABOUT TO ATTACK TORREON

KHAKI LINE OF VILLA'S ADVANCE SURROUNDING CITY.

ARMY IS IN HIGH SPIRITS

Villa's Men Believe Federal Troops Cannot Long Withstand Force Being Brought Against Them —The Maneuvering.

Bermejillo, Durango, March 24.—The ragged khaki line of General Villa's advance is surrounding Torreon, with the other divisions scattered along the route for 15 miles further back, but hastening to the support of the vanguard.

Villa Goes to Front.

Villa has left for the front to take personal command. While his main guard is closing in on Torreon, having driven the federals from the outposts in the smaller town to the north, other rebel columns are reported to be drawing closer to the invested city from the south and southwest.

From Gobez Palacio, a suburb three miles from Torreon, to the city itself the country is laced with irrigation ditches which the Federals are reported to have adapted for rifle trenches. At some point along these three miles a pitched battle is probable, possibly at Cerro La Pila, a mountain which the Federals are reported to have fortified.

Must Be Taken.

If this proves true the position must be taken, as the big guns have ample power to cover the three miles between the mountains and Torreon. It is said that the manning of La Pila would be a legitimate part of the defense of Torreon, although its comparative isolation would make support from other parts of the Federal defenses practically impossible. The defenders would be in danger of being absolutely cut off, and for this reason the Rebels doubt that the enemy if really there, will make more than a long range defense before falling back upon the main force.

Army in High Spirit.

The army is in high spirits and the generals are of the opinion that Torreon can not hope to hold out against the forces now being brought against it.

The first important move of the week just passed took place when General Villa, having appeared suddenly from Chihuahua, set his troops in motion early Friday morning from Yermo, which is about 100 miles north of Torreon. Fifteen miles north of this city he came upon a strong advance column of the Federals, who are believed to have been under orders to retreat upon appearance of the enemy. The appearance of the Rebels was so sudden, however, that the retreat became almost a rout.

The Federals, like the Rebels, were mounted, and the encounter became a sort of a steeple-chase, with the pursuers, smothered in the dust kicked up by their mounts, firing blindly from the saddle, not in the least impeded by the scattered bullets which the Federals sometimes turned to fire.

The fight continued at a gallop right into the streets of this little city, and here it was that most of the Federal losses occurred. The bodies of 108 were picked up by Villa's men. The Federals are believed to have carried off those who were wounded in this city, as only three were found. The Rebel loss was practically nothing.

On the heels of the cavalry came other troops, and General Benavides, with a superior force was sent, by rail, against Tlahualilo, a town northeast of Bermejillo.

At a great irrigation ditch, shortly after leaving Bermejillo, Benavides came upon a Federal force which he estimated to number 400. An hour's engagement ensued, as a result of which the Rebel commander reported to General Villa the rout of the enemy, leaving 90 dead on the field. His own loss he reported as three killed and seven wounded.

TRIPLE ALLIANCE QUESTION

Three Monarchs Will Have Conferences and Consider Question Quite Fully.

Berlin, March 24.—Emperor William is enroute for Corfu. On the way he will have conferences with Emperor Francis Joseph and King Victor Emmanuel.

It is probable that the future plans of the Triple Alliance will be fully considered.

The emperor was present Sunday at the dedication of the Royal Library and Academy of Sciences. Ambassador Gerard represented the United States.

Great Pacific Northwest Wheat Crop.

Portland, Ore., March 24.—The Pacific northwest is to see the greatest wheat yield in her history, for estimators place the 1914 harvest for Washington, Oregon, and Idaho at 70,000,000 bushels, with a farm value running above $60,000,000. Winter wheat in Washington not only is in better condition than it has ever been, but there will be more of it. The total acreage of wheat in Walla Walla county, one of the biggest producers is approximately 280,000 acres and 85 per cent of this is in fall sown grain.

"BOUND FOR WESTERN CANADA"

A PRAIRIE SCHOONER SLOGAN, THAT STARTED FROM NEBRASKA.

Four horses abreast attached to a red painted prairie schooner, with windows and a protruding stovepipe, with the words, "Bound for Canada," on the schooner's side, was the object of considerable interest as it passed on the way northward from Nebraska a short time ago through the towns in Nebraska, South and North Dakota. After some weeks of strenuous traveling in this way, Mr. J. F. Jensen made the overland trip from Jameson, Nebraska, and with his little family made the regular customs entry at North Portal, in the province of Saskatchewan. Their destination was Willow Bunch, a district that Mr. Jensen had selected as one in which it was possible for him to work out his fortune. He located on a good half section of land, and intended putting on it some cattle that would fatten on the wild prairie grass that grows so luxuriously in that district. In addition to this his purpose was to cultivate a portion of it and raise wheat, oats, barley or flax. In short, a life devoted to mixed farming was what he had in view and it is easy to understand that he will make a success of it, and in a year or so will attach some more land holdings.

Although his beginning may be small, it may safely be said that Mr. Jensen, like thousands of others who have begun life in western Canada on no more and with probably much less, will prosper. He will not be far from a line of railway. Schools will be close at hand and other social conditions so necessary in a new country are available.—Advertisement.

SYNOPSIS.

Francois Beaupre, a peasant babe of three years, after an amusing incident in which Marshal Ney figures, is made a Chevalier of France by the Emperor Napoleon, who prophesied that the boy might one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. At the age of ten Francois visits General Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, who with Alixe, his seven-year-old daughter, lives at the Chateau. A soldier of the Empire under Napoleon he fires the boy's imagination with stories of his campaigns. The boy becomes a copyist for the general and learns of the friendship between the general and Marquis Zappi, who campaigned with the general under Napoleon. Marquis Zappi and his son, Pietro, arrive at the Chateau. The general agrees to care for the Marquis' son while the former goes to America. The Marquis asks Francois to be a friend of his son. The boy solemnly promises. Francois goes to the Chateau to live. Marquis Zappi dies leaving Pietro as a ward of the general. Alixe, Pietro and Francois meet a strange boy who proves to be Prince Louis Napoleon. Francois saves his life. The general discovers Francois loves Alixe, and extracts a promise from him that he will not interfere between the girl and Pietro. Francois goes to Italy as secretary to Pietro. Queen Hortense plans the escape of her son Louis Napoleon by disguising him and Marquis Zappi as her lackeys. Francois takes Marquis Zappi's place, who is ill, in the escape of Hortense and Louis. Dressed as Louis' brother Francois lures the Austrians from the hotel allowing the prince and his mother to escape. Francois is a prisoner of the Austrians for five years, in the castle owned by Pietro in Italy. He discovers in his guard one of Pietro's old family servants, and through him sends word to his friends of his plight. The general, Alixe and Pietro plans Francois' escape. Francois receives a note from Pietro explaining in detail how to escape from his prison. Alixe awaits him on horseback and leads him to his friends on board the American sailing vessel, the "Lovely Lucy." Francois, as a guest of Harry Hampton, on the "Lovely Lucy," goes to America to manage Pietro's estate in Virginia. Lucy Hampton falls in love with Francois. Prince Louis Napoleon in America becomes the guest of the Hamptons, where he meets Francois. Lucy Hampton reveals her love for Francois after the latter saves the life of Harry Hampton and is himself injured in the effort. Francois tells Lucy of his love for Alixe. He returns to France and tells Alixe his one wish in life is that she love Pietro. Francois joins the political plotters. His health fails and he is forced to return to America. Later Napoleon summons him to London to aid him in his plots to gain the French throne. Lucy Hampton weds her cousin. Pietro proposes to Alixe and is accepted. They plan a letter to Francois telling him his wish is granted. Francois on the night before the battle shows the prince a letter from Alixe, which he thinks is a confession of her love for him.

Prince Louis saw the dawning of consternation. Rapidly he considered. Was it well to take away a man's happiness and courage just before a fight? He remembered some words of Francois spoken three years before, words whose dramatic bareness had struck him. "When a knight of the old time went into battle," the young man had said, "he wore on his helmet the badge of his lady, and the thought of her in his heart. A man fights better so." Very well. This blind knight should have his letter, with the meaning he had read into it, for his lady's badge, and he should fight tomorrow with the thought of her in his heart. The letter suggested another meaning to sophisticated Louis Bonaparte, but there is no need to hasten the feet of unhappiness. The resonant French voice spoke at last in an unused accent of cordiality and the Prince lied, with ungrudging graciousness.

"Mistaken, my Francois! Not at all. The little billet-doux breathes love for you in each line—there is no question! But, mon ami, you have not finished your story." So Francois explained about the letter left with Lucy Hampton and its premature sending. "That has reached her now—she knows now that I love her, she knows what has really been my lifelong wish—she has hurried this," and his hand crushed the note tenderly—"she has hurried this to me before the fight—that I might know her love also—that I might fight better for you, my Prince—Louis—with that joy in my heart." Prince Louis, his head thrown back, his expressionless eyes watching the rings of smoke which he puffed from his mouth—ring after ring, mounting in dream-like procession to the low ceiling, considered again. Somewhere in the chain of events of this love-affair his keen practical sense felt a link that did not fit—a link forced into connection. Vaguely he discerned how it was—something had happened to the Virginian letter—there had been a confusion somewhere. To him the four words of Alixe's postscript were final. "Pietro sends his love." A subconscious reasoning made him certain that Pietro would not have come into such a letter if it had been indeed a love-letter; that the three lines of writing just before the battle could not have held another man's name, if they had been written to the man whom she loved. Very dimly, very surely the Prince concluded these things; and then he lowered his cigar, and his gray dull eyes came down from the ceiling and rested, kindly on the radiant face. "You are right, my friend. It was an exquisite thought of your lady-love to put this other weapon, this bright sword of happiness into your hand, to fight with tomorrow. Mon Dieu; we will reward her by sending her back a Marshal's baton by you; a Marshal's baton tomorrow, Francois! How would it sound, par example, to say 'Madame la Marechale'?"

The light from Francois' eyes was like a lamp.

"My Prince—Sire—there are three things I have desired all my life, all great things, but of them that one—the baton of a Marshal—is the least. If I might win her love—I have said; if I might help put you in Napoleon's place and shout 'Vive l'Empereur' for you on the throne of France; if I might fulfill the Emperor's prophecy and be not a 'Marshal some day' any longer but a Marshal of your empire—it is asking much of one lifetime, above all for a man born a peasant, is it not? Yet of those three wishes one wonderful fulfillment has come to me"—he gripped his letter closer—"and one, I believe tomorrow brings. Before tomorrow night"—his great eyes were lifted toward the ceiling of the room, and in them was the rapt look of the child of the farm-house in the Jura, a look of a seer of visions, a look that caught at the Prince's nerves, and made him draw a breath quickly. "Something above myself tells me," Francois said slowly, and the words came with a languid power, as if his personality were a medium, "that before tomorrow night the officers who stand about you shall hail you Emperor over the body of a man who lies before you."

In the silence, the Prince's watch could be heard ticking. Francois shivered violently.

"Ugh!" he said, his teeth chattering. "It gives me a 'crise de nerfs,' that trick of vision-seeing. I do not like it, and yet at times it seizes me. Why should it come to a man happy as I am—a man who has dared ask three enormous wishes of the good fairies; who holds one of them in his hand"—he lifted the letter—"who sees another in easy reach, and who," he smiled brilliantly, "who will be well content without the third, my Prince, the first two being his." He shivered again. "Is the night raw? It is as if I were in a grave, this coldness," he said, looking about with a disturbed gaze, "yet my life is just beginning."

The Prince rose and tossed his cigar to the fireplace. "It is simply that you are tired, Francois," he said in the tranquil tones which no peril disturbed. "The nerves of us all are stretched and yours are the finest strung. Go to bed, and at daylight you will be warm enough, with the work that awaits us. Sleep well—good night, my friend."

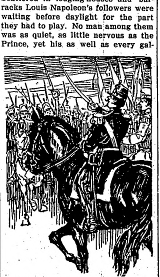
Later, in the darkness of his chamber, Prince Louis lay awake, his imagination filled with the man whose dramatic personality appealed to him as few had ever done. He thought of his own life, according to his lights not a bad life, radically strong and radically gentle, yet complicated, abnormal from its start, with many shadows and many stains; then of the crystal clearness of this other's, with his three wishes in which he trusted as simply as a child would trust to the fairies. A smile almost tender stole across the mask-like features in the dark. "There is no doubt but the girl will marry the marquis," he reflected. "Yet I am glad I left him his hope and his happiness." A vision of Francois' beatified look rose before him.

"A man fights better so," the Prince murmured aloud, and, his own sadness forgotten in another man's joy, he fell asleep.

CHAPTER XXXII.

The Bugle-Call.

The gray dawn of a Sunday morning began to break over the sleeping city of Boulogne, yet earlier than the dawn anxious eyes opened to watch, and men's hearts beat fast to meet it. Scattered in lodging-houses and barracks Louis Napoleon's followers were waiting before daylight for the part they had to play. No man among them was as quiet, as little nervous as the Prince, yet his as well as every gallant heart of them felt a throb of relief with its bound of excitement when a trumpet from the Austerlitz barracks, the barracks of the fourth artillery, Napoleon's own regiment, suddenly sounded.



"Soldiers! The Honor of Beginning a New Empire Shall Be Yours!"

It was the signal, and in a moment the Prince and his escort were moving down the dark street toward Colonel Vaudrey's quarters, toward that ringing note not yet died out from the pulsing air.

The city was tranquil when Prince Louis reached the barrack-gate, and the soldier-blood in him rushed in a tide when he saw sixty mounted artillerymen posted at the entrance, and beyond, in the yard, statue-like, warlike, silent, the regiment formed in square. If the fourth artillery followed its colonel, if the day went well, this was the core of his army. Colonel Vaudrey was in the center of the square; the Prince marched quietly to him and as he came, with a sharp simultaneous clatter that was the music of Heaven to his ears, the whole regiment presented arms.

In the glowing light the soldiers who fronted toward him could see that the colorless face turned grayer, but that was all, and quickly Colonel Vaudrey spoke to his men.

"Soldiers of the fourth artillery," he said loudly, "a revolution begins today under the nephew of the Emperor Napoleon. He is before you, and comes to lead you. He has returned to his land to give back the people their rights, the army its greatness. He trusts in your courage, your devotion to accomplish this glorious mission. My soldiers, your colonel has answered for you. Shout then with me 'Long live Napoleon! Long live the Emperor.'"

The terse soldierly words were hardly finished when the regiment, strongly Bonapartist always, carried off its feet now by the sight of the Prince, by the honor of being the first to whom he came caught up the cry, and the deep voices sent it rolling down the empty streets. Louis Bonaparte standing erect, motionless, impassive as always, wondered if a pulse might beat harder than his and not break. He held up his hand, and rapidly, yet with lingering shouts of enthusiasm, the tumult quieted.

"Soldiers," he said, "I have come to you first because between you and me there are great memories. With you the Emperor, my uncle, served as captain; with you he won glory at the siege of Toulon; you opened the gates of Grenoble to him when he came back from Elba. Soldiers, the honor of beginning a new empire shall be yours; yours shall be the honor of saluting first the eagle of Austerlitz and Wagram." He caught the standard from an officer and held it high. "It is the sign of French glory; it has shone over every battlefield; it has passed through every capitol of Europe. Soldiers, rally to the eagle! I trust it to you—we will march today against the oppressors, crying 'Long live France.'"

One who has not heard a regiment gone mad can not know how it was. With deafening clatter and roar every sword was drawn and the shakos flew aloft and again and again and again the men's deep voices sent up in broken magnificent chorus the great historic cry to which armies had gone into battle.

"Vive l'Empereur! Vive Napoleon!"

The souls of a thousand men were on fire with memories and traditions, with a passion of consecration to a cause, and as if the spell of the name grew stronger with its repetition they shouted over and over, in tremendous unison, over and over and over.

"Vive Napoleon! Vive l'Empereur!"

It was necessary at last for the quiet slender young man who was the storm-center to raise his hand again, and with a word, with the glimmer of a smile to speak his gratitude—to stop the storm. There was much to be done. The fourth artillery was but one of several regiments to be gained if the victory were to be complete. Colonel Lombard was dispatched to a printing office with proclamations to be struck off; Lieutenant Laity hurried away to his battalion; a detachment was sent to hold the telegraph office; the tumult once quieted, the yard was a scene of efficient business, for all this had been planned and each officer knew his work. In a very few moments the officers of the third artillery who were with the Prince had hastened to their quarters, another had been sent to arouse the forty-sixth of the line, at the Place d' Alton barracks, and shortly Prince Louis himself was on his way to the same place. Through the streets of the city, no longer empty, he passed with his officers, and the people poured from their houses, and joined and answered the shouts of the soldiers.

"Vive l'Empereur!" the soldiers cried. "It is the nephew of Napoleon," and the citizens threw back, "Vive l'Empereur! It is the son of the honest king of Holland! It is the grandson of Josephine!"

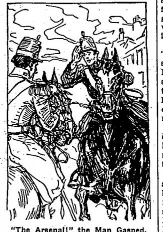
They pressed so close about the small figure in its Swiss uniform of a colonel that for a moment he was separated from his officers, and Colonel Vaudrey, smiling for all his military discipline, was forced to order his mounted artillerymen to clear the road. Every moment an old soldier broke out of the mass and embraced the eagle which Lieutenant de Querelles carried proudly high above all this emotion; the soldiers' eyes flashed with success; the Prince's heart beat high for joy to know that he had not misread the heart of army or people. When the column passed the gendarmerie the guard turned out and presented arms, shouting, "Long live the Emperor!" So he went through the streets of Boulogne, Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, eight long years before he came to his own, and marched in triumph and acclamation to a failure.

And close by his side, his look as radiant as the Prince's look was contained and impassive, marched always Francois Beaupre. The hard-earned military knowledge, the patient toil of preparation had come into play, and in a hundred ways the man had been useful. With no exact rank as yet, but ready at any moment, eager for the hardest task, never asking for rest, quick-witted, resourceful, officers as well as Prince had developed a habit of turning to Beaupre for service after service. And always they were met with a glad consent which encouraged them to ask more until the Prince said:

"It is the case of the willing horse; I will not permit that my right-hand man be worked to death—it must stop."

Today, however, Francois had a definite duty of responsibility. While the Prince marched, gathering strength at every yard, through the town toward the Place d' Alton at its farther side, Colonel Couard of the third artillery had gone to proclaim the great news to his regiment and to hold them ready. In case of success at the Place d' Alton, Beaupre was to go back and bring them to join the Prince. In case of failure they were to be his reserve. The Place d' Alton barracks lay between town and ramparts, to be reached from the town side only by a narrow lane; but the ramparts commanded with a large open space the yard where the soldiers assembled. If the Prince entered from the town side, from the street—Faubourg Pierre—only an escort could go with him. If he went by the ramparts the whole enthusiastic fourth artillery might be at his back. This then was the route chosen.

But as the Prince and the regiment and the swinging shouting mass of citizens made its way toward the quarters, suddenly, too late, the officers about his Highness saw that some one had blundered. Someone in the van a man had lost his head, had forgotten, and the compact inelastic procession had been led toward the approach from the Faubourg Pierre, the narrow lane at the side toward the city. It was a serious mistake, yet not of necessity fatal, and at all events they must make the best of it. The Prince could not make a dramatic entrance at the head of a shouting regiment, but for all that he might win the forty-sixth.



"The Arsenal!" the Man Gasped.

He did win the forty-sixth. Something had happened to the officer sent to arouse them—another slip in the chain—and instead of being drawn up in the yard they were getting ready for Sunday inspection, but they flocked to the windows at the noise, they rushed into the yard at the name of Napoleon. An old sergeant of the Imperial Guard ran forward and kissed Prince Louis' hand, and the reserved face lightened—he knew the value of a bit of sentiment with Frenchmen; he was not wrong; in a moment the line regiment had caught up the cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" raised by the artillerymen, and the earlier scene of the Austerlitz barracks was being repeated here. Prince Louis, pale and composed in the center of the roar of voices, the seething sea of excitement, heard a word at his ear and turned.

"Sire, it is success. I go to bring up your Majesty's other regiment," Francois said, and the Prince answered quietly:

"Yes, it is success. Go, mon ami."

In a moment the messenger had thrown himself on the horse of an artilleryman and forced a way through the recoiling mass, down the lane, and out to the Faubourg Pierre. In the free street he galloped the horse, through the windings that he had learned with this moment in his mind. The third was drawn up waiting, and a shout like a clap of thunder greeted his news. Buoyant, proud, he took his place by the colonel at their head, and gaily the joyful march back began. The sun had come from behind the clouds of early morning and shone gloriously on glancing steel, on the brilliant swinging line of the regiment. Low branches of trees brushed Francois' shoulder as he rode and the touch thrilled him, for he knew by it that this was true and not a dream, and he, Francois Beaupre, was leading a regiment of France to France's Emperor.

Suddenly a man galloped from a side street, in front of the advancing troops; he stopped, saluted, called a word. It was not a day to take anything for granted; Colonel Couard halted the regiment.

"The arsenal," the man gasped. "They have taken Monsieur de Persigny prisoner. Monsieur le General Voirol is on his way, but he is distant. It is a step from here. The third artillery could arrive there before him—they would surrender—Monsieur de Persigny would be released"—he stopped breathless.

The colonel turned an inquiring look on Francois. As the Prince's messenger, as the man whom he had seen closest to the Prince's person, he deferred to him, and Francois realized that he must make, and make quickly, a momentous decision. The arsenal was immense and lightly guarded. De Persigny had been sent with a small force to take it, for the ammunition it held might at any moment be of supreme importance. It seemed that the detachment which guarded it had been underrated, for it had made prisoners of De Persigny and his men, and this aide-de-camp alone escaped. If they were to be rescued, if the arsenal was to be gained for the Prince, this very moment must be seized. General Voirol, royalist, the commandant at Boulogne, was on his way with reinforcements and the third might well hold the arsenal against him but not gain it from him. With his whole being concentrated Francois thought. The orders were plain to lead the third artillery to join the Prince on the ramparts. But there are times in history when to obey orders is treachery. Was not this moment, heavy with the right or wrong of his decision, one of them? Was it not the part of a mind capable of greatness to know and grasp the flying second of opportunity? Would not the Prince reproach him, if he stupidly let this one chance in a thousand go by, for servile fear of disobeying orders? He had left his Highness safe with two regiments at his back; this other could do nothing at the Place d' Alton barracks but swell the ranks; here, by a turn of a hand, they might win for the cause the very blood and bones of success, a mighty arsenal, and for themselves honor and gratitude from their Emperor. In Francois' mind was a touch of innocent vanity that he should have the power to render so signal a service, yet no thought at all for himself or for the honor he might gain or lose; whole-heartedly he weighed the reasons why or why not it would be best for the Prince.

The aide-de-camp's voice broke in. "My Colonel, I beg you, I implore you, save Monsieur de Persigny. The Prince loves him—he will be very angry if he is left helpless—they threaten to execute him—I myself heard—I impore you, Monsieur le Colonel. For the rest, it is indeed the moment of fate to win the arsenal."

Francois' face lit with a fire of decision. "My Colonel, it is for the Prince—it would be his will—we must not let slip the gift of destiny: To the arsenal!"

And while orders rang out sharply and the regiment wheeled into sliding lines that doubled and parted and flowed together again in an elastic stream toward the looming arsenal, Francois, with a quick word to De Persigny's aide-de-camp, was writing rapidly on a bit of paper.

"You will take this to the Prince at once," he ordered, and the young officer saluted, for he, too, knew, as most of them did, this man's anomalous yet strong hold on Prince Louis.

Francois rode again to the colonel's side, and he did not doubt that he had decided rightly.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

The Accolade at Last.

It is a common tragedy that men, being human, cannot see all sides of a question; that a decision right in one light may bring disaster in another. If events had stayed where he left them, Francois Beaupre and Colonel Couard and his regiment would have won honor and eternal gratitude from Louis Bonaparte for the quarter of an hour's work which made the arsenal theirs. Events, instead of standing still, or going forward, took an unexpected sinister turn, not long after Francois' going.

The happy Prince, smiling the shadowy smile which made his face winning, stood in the center of triumphant turmoil: his new followers, the men of the forty-sixth, crowded about him shouting, cheering, kissing his hands, and the loyal fourth artillerymen fraternized, embraced, congratulated the men of the line regiment. The narrow courtyard was a hubbub of rapturous excitement, and the Prince's officers—Montholon, Vaudrey, Voisin, Parquin, D'Hunin, Querelles—these and others whose names Frenchmen knew, surrounded the small figure which yet had so much of royalty, and laughed and chatted light-heartedly. In a few moments, when Colonel Laity's engineers and the third artillery should have arrived the Prince would have five thousand men under his command. The great game was practically won—Prince Louis was all but Emperor.

Suddenly, above the sea of sound, a commotion was heard at the farther end of the barrack yard. The colonel of the forty-sixth, Colonel Talandier, had arrived. Very loyal to Louis Phillipe, very angry at the scene before him, he would not believe the news. He called excitedly, and the men's voices died down as they saw him gesticulating.

"Soldiers," he cried, "you are deceived! This man for whom you are shouting is an adventurer, an impostor!"

In the shock of silence which followed his words, another voice rang out, clear and indignant, the voice of a staff-officer whom they all knew.

"It is not the nephew of the Emperor! It is the nephew of Colonel Vaudrey! I recognize him!" the officer cried in a strong staccato, and a gasp as if ice-water had been scattered went through the crowded place.

There is nothing more absurd in history than the instant effect of this quick-witted lie. Only with a mercurial French mob, perhaps, could it have succeeded, but it succeeded here with hopeless swiftness. It flew from mouth to mouth—they were cheated, tricked; the Emperor's nephew, their Prince, had not come; this young man was a make-believe, a substitute, the nephew of an officer; some of the soldiers who had shown most enthusiasm almost lost their minds now in rage.

Colonel Talandier began to form his men; the Prince, composed as ever, yet earnest, swift, tried to rally his, but it was impossible to start anywhere, in this confusion, for line and artillery had become mixed in an unmanageable mob. A word from either Prince or colonel and blood would have flowed.

Yet the steadfast mind kept its hope; he glanced every moment toward the ramparts. The third must appear there shortly; it could not be many minutes. They would turn the tide. One glimpse of that solid swinging regiment and the day would be saved—and salvation was certain. The third was coming, would be here any second—Francois' faithfulness could be trusted.

Slowly, with his officers crowding about him, he was driven toward the barracks wall, and, in a flash, from somewhere, a man was before him, thrusting a bit of paper at him. With a swift movement he had it opened and read:

"Destiny throws arsenal into our hands. Have taken third artillery to hold it. I wait to bring the news—a jewel for your crown. Vive l'Empereur! Beaupre."

Few men ever heard Louis Napoleon sob, yet the officers stood about him at that moment caught a sound that wrung them. It meant the end, and they knew it. Passionately he crushed the paper and threw it into the seething mass.

"Fool! He has thrown away the empire," he hissed through set teeth. "If I could run him through!"

Then, quickly, he was himself again. Serenely while the maddened soldiers pressed on him, he turned and spoke a quiet word to his friends, and then, serenely, too, with a gaze that was half contemptuous, half friendly, he let himself be made prisoner.

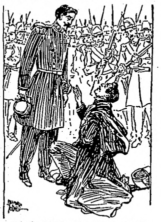
Yet the fight was not all over even now. On the ramparts, where the Prince and his column should have been, had gathered from the Faubourg Pierre a formidable crowd, who advanced angrily to his rescue, and pelted the line regiment with stones, and cried again and again, "Vive l'Empereur!" Colonel Talandier had to reckon with a many-sided trouble. But the heart of it was in his hands, and slowly order and the old rule were coming back.

The tumult of the struggle had quieted, the volatile forty-sixth regiment, returned to its allegiance, stood formed in ranks, in appearance as firm for the king as the everlasting hills, and, at the end of the court was a sad and silent, yet a stately group of men, the Prince who had almost been Emperor and those who had watched slipping with his hope, their hopes of grandeur.

Suddenly a horse's hoofs rang down the lane from the Faubourg; a rider clattered at gallop into the yard and across the front of the soldiers, and every one in the agitated company saw that the man reeling in his saddle was wounded. With blind gaze he stared about as he reined in, and then he caught sight of the sorry group, the Prince and his officers. To Francois Beaupre, clutching to this world by one thread of duty, this was the victorious Emperor and his triumphant staff. With a choking shout he threw himself from the horse and fell, too far gone to stand, at the Prince's feet.

"Sire; I bring you the arsenal," he stammered painfully, loudly. In the silence of the courtyard one heard every word. "Two wishes—good fairies—" he gasped. And then, his mouth twisting to a smile, "the third—is no matter."

Louis Bonaparte looked down at the man whose dying face stared up at him in a rapture of loyalty; whose life had been consecrated to him; whose death was for him; who had lost him an empire. For a second a struggle shook him, and then the large kindness through which he came nearest to greatness, overflowed. In the career to come was no finer moment, no higher inspiration for Prince Louis than this. He bent close to the glazing eyes.



"Sire! I Bring You the Arsenal."

"Courage!" he said clearly. "Courage, mon ami. Live for me and for our country. Live, my brother Francois—Chevalier Beaupre, Marshal of the Empire." And the Prince's sword flashed out and touched his shoulder.

The other world closing about him Francois heard—they did not doubt it who saw the eyes flame as a firefly flames out of darkness, and when his lips stirred they knew that he wished to cry once more "Vive l'Empereur!"

Frenchmen all, shaken with the living drama, the ruined men who stood about a defeated Prince cried it for him—the old magic cry of the Bonapartes. With kepis lifted, as one man, "Vive l'Empereur!" the deep voices thrilled, hailing a lost cause for a lost life. But only the Prince knew that a thought came after; only he caught, on the gasp which let the soul out, a girl's name. He bent quickly again, with an eager assurance, but it was late. The accolade of a higher king had touched his servant, and the knightly soul of Francois had risen.

THE END.

We suppose there is no use to kick about the result of that elimination convention, even if your favorite candidate did not win out, but we are of the opinion that it would have strengtened the party more if they had eliminated all of the candidates that have filed and chosen a new man. There is no doubt that Lee would make a good clean governor, but he lacks the vote getting power to defeat a popular man put up by the democratic party. He starts out with one handicap which is, that he was the one to propose that elimination convention, and some people may be unkind enough to say, that he attended to it to get delegates enough into it to properly eliminate the other candidates.

The mails are burdened now days with circulars, from so called specialists doctors, who advertise to cure all ills that the human race are subject to. They realize that a sick person is easy to coax money out of, if they assure them of a speedy and permanent cure. The government has been getting after this class of frauds with a sharp stick lately, but it is pretty hard to reach the class that have their pills put up under the pure food law. A small amount of brand seasoned with bitter aloes would naturally pass inspection under the pure food law, but of course it would not cure any disease, and the so called specialists do not expect it to. But they buy these pills by the peck and get them cheap. Then all they require is a type writer and a small office under the roof of one of them big city sky scrapers, and they are ready for business in the specialist line. This is the lowest, dirtiest class of swindlers that are at liberty in this country to day, as they get about all of their money from the poorer classes of sick people.

LET'S INVADE MEXICO!

We have been against the invasion of Mexico, as strongly as we knew how to be.

Intervention means invasion invasion means conquest, conquest means grabbing territory.

Dooley, perhaps unconsciously, put vividly the ludicrous attitude of the president's critics when, after flaying the waiting policy of the administration with masterly sarcasm through half a page, he said, in reply to Hennessy's very pertinent inquiry as to what he'd do about it if it were his say, that he'd say "go into Mexico" if he knew how to get out again.

There's the rub; and there's where the critics of the administration fall down every time—all except a few of the franker ones who candidly admit that they wouldn't want to get out once they get in.

And that's one reason why we have been against the invasion of Mexico.

But now we have an idea, and we are no longer against invading Mexico. We're for it; strong.

Let's make up an army consisting of Senator Fall of New Mexico, who, according to his autobiography in the congressional directory, "is engaged in mining in Mexico," William Randolph Hearst of San Francisco and New York, who is also "engaged in mining in Mexico," and Governor Colquitt of Texas, who may or may not be "engaged in mining in Mexico" but who is manifestly looking for trouble.

Let them be joined by all those who feel and talk as they do, and let THEM shoulder muskets and invade Mexico.

And let the rest of us stand around and cheer them on their way with such remarks as "go to it!" and "good riddance."—The Duluth Herald.

Took Tim at His Word.

"That cigar of yours," said the passenger with the chin beard, smilingly, genially, "has burned about half its length down one side."

"So?" frowned the man with the curled mustache, turning his head slowly and looking at him from head to foot. "Well, that is the way I like my cigars, sir."

So when a spark from his cigar fell on the skirt of his new sixty dollar overcoat and proceeded to burn a hole in it the man with the chin beard reflected. "Perhaps that's the way he likes his overcoats," and said nothing —Chicago Tribune.

A Distinction.

T. S. JACOBSON licensed auctioneer, Highlanding, Minn. Prompt attention given to auction sales of farm property.

Read the announcement of G. P. Jones, published in another colum.

There is to be a school basket party and dance at the Erie hall tomorrow night.

We were informed this week, that Edward Singer went away somewhare and found him a wife.

Henry Peterson of Rhoda will give a free wedding dance at the Wojnerowski hall on Saturday April 4th,. All are envited.

We understand that a Doctor will locate at Highlanding as soon as the new bank building is completed so he can get office rooms.

There was six inches of snow fall on Tuesday night, which has the appearance of stopping with us for a few days.

My wife Mrs. Hunt has taken an active interest in farming and Poultry raising. We as the farmer produce the grain to feed the chickens and the Poultry raiser takes the income.

There was a fairly good attendance at the Mrs. Narveson sale on Wednesday, and the stock and machinery brought fairly good prices. Mrs. Narveson will continue to reside on her farm, but will rent the plowed land for this season.

We publish this week the articles of Incorporation of the First State Bank, of Highlanding. The bank will start building soon, and will be ready to open to do general banking business early in May.

We have omitted to publish the picture of C. L. Hanson, candidate for senator, this week, for the reason that his picture does not do justice to the man. Hanson has no scars on his face, but is one of the boys. Call and see him at the First National Bank, at Thief River Falls.

In selecting your seed grain be careful not to get grain with foul seed in it. It is better to pay extra prices for pure seed grain than to run any risk of sowing foul seed. But look after it yourself. We got a sample of seed oats from a famous seed house last week which had two kernels of wild oats in it.

We noted that quite a large number of farmers from the town of Mayfield were in attendance at the Narveson sale, showing that they expect to still continue to be residents of that town, not withstanding Singers report to the P. O. Department that the town is only entitled to a stub mail route to Kratka.

It seems that Bro. Cutter, of the News-Press is taking quite an active interest in the management of the affairs of this county commissioner district. Perhaps the people up this way who are badly mixed with socialists are not capable of managing their own affairs. However the people of Highlanding have got the reputation of being somewhat "political scrappers" and outsiders of this commissioner district had better beware of any interference with our business. Enough said for the present.

There is a lot of the fault of too narrow grades on the state ditches due to the farmers who live along the route, and may not know that they are paying for the work being done. They naturally have sympathy for the poor fellows who are doing the work, and say, "that is good enough." Then when the commissioners and engineer comes to accept the work the road grader will say, "the farmers are satisfied with the quality of this work and now by gosh I want my money." Who is to blame for the grades being too narrow?

TESTED SEED CORN.

Many inquiries are received by the Thief River Falls High School for reliable seed corn raised in this section of the state. The school has some guaranteed seed of standard varieties for sale, and also a list of farmers who have good seed to spare. All successful corn growers and corn experts earnestly advise against the moving of seed corn more than 100 miles north, and even suggest that corn cannot be safely moved more than 50 miles north in one season. In view of the importance of using local grown seed, the High School desires to serve as a medium for bringing the seller and the buyer together. All persons having seed corn for sale are requested to add their names to the list already on file at the High School stating the amount and variety of seed they offer, and buyers may in like manner register their needs. All corn will be tested free of charge. As reliable seed corn of local growth is now held at $4 per bushel, it behooves both sides to get busy at once.

In addition to the work already accomplished by the High School along development lines, it is essential that farm clubs and farming organizations be perfected in every town in Pennington county During the month of March the territory immediately about Thief River Falls will be organized. The co-operation of all interested persons is requested that this foundational work may be promptly and successfully accomplished in order that more important matters may receive consideration later. The High School can secure organizers and entertainers and also supply experts and lecturers from abroad and at no cost to any one. In addition to the efforts which may originate at the school, it might be added that club or community movements initiated by the farmers themselves will have the active support and assistance of the school people.

Any correspondence directed to the High School will receive prompt attention,

STATE NEWS IN BRIEF

LEE SELECTED AT STATE CONFERENCE

SO-CALLED ANTI-MACHINE REPUBLICANS HOLD ELIMINATION MEETING.

THOUSAND DELEGATES THERE

Todd County Man Wins Out Over Iverson, Peterson, Lee and Elwell—Nomination Made Unanimous.

Minneapolis.—William E. Lee, of Todd County, was the unanimous choice for govenor of the so-called anti-machine Republicans of the state, who met here Thursday.

The vote for the candidates was as follows: William E. Lee, 555; Samuel G. Iverson, 197; James A. Peterson, 186; Senator J. T. Elwell, 11; and J. F. Jacobson, 1.

After the vote had been taken by counties, Lee was declared the unanimous choice of the convention amid deafening cheers.

Lee Thanks Delegates.

Mounting the platform, Mr. Lee said:

"I want to thank you for this honor. I would willingly have served in the ranks, but you have called me to lead. I propose to lead from now until the polls have closed.

"I accept this nomination, free to do the right thing as I see it. I am a Republican and all Republicans shall be alike to me. I recognize no individual. I shall stand by this convention until the next gubernatorial election.

"Corruptness and dishonesty may work their way into any administration, but if they stay there the fault is with the people. The people know the evils of our government, and it is for them to cure them. They can lower taxation by lowering the cost of government."

Iverson Vows Allegiance.

Following this address Mr. Iverson was called to the platform. He said:

"I want to repeat what I said a short while ago. I am for the man whom you have selected. I am for William E. Lee for governor. What is more, the selection you have made today will be ratified by the people next June and November.

"There is a grand victory in sight. We are going to have an unmuzzled press, and thousands and thousands of upright men believe it is time for them to protect themselves from the enemies of good government."

Elwell Is Satisfied.

Mr. Elwell said:

"It is all over except the work. I am with you as much as I was this morning, and will be with you until after the election. We are going to elect William E. Lee next November."

The morning session was given over to speechmaking by the four candidates for the Republican anti-machine nomination for governor.

Denunciation of the "present government" of the state of Minnesota and of Governor A. O. Eberhart were contained in a vigorous series of resolutions submitted by a committee of which E. T. Young was chairman.

Delegates rallied around the county standards and practically one thousand filled the seats provided when the chairman of the conference committee called the gathering to order.

Frazee Lumber Camps Break.

Frazee.—The camps of the local lumber company are breaking up and the town is full of lumberjacks. The men are spending their money freely, but are orderly and no serious disturbance is expected. The company has had a good season, getting in many millions of feet of logs for the mill here. In about a month the sawing season will begin. As soon as the river thaws the log drive will be started. It is about ninety miles by river to the mill, the logs being driven through a dozen lakes and Otter Tail river. The mill will run night and day shifts, as usual, employing more than 400 men.

Indians File Charges.

Virginia, Minn.—Eight of the members of the Nett Lake Indian band, living on the Nett Lake reservation near this city, have returned home from a trip to Washington, D. C., where they filed charges against A. B. Regan, Indian agent on the reservation. The delegation was headed by Rev. Pequette, Indian agency minister. A special representative of the department of the interior has come.

Lower Temperatures Welcomed.

Winona.—Farmers in southern Minnesota are elated with the change in the weather conditions and welcome the lower temperatures. They believe it means ideal growing conditions when warmer weather finally becomes steady. Farmers in this section, it is argued, have had their experiences with early springs and do not long for them. Invariably when the early seeding is accomplished before the normal season arrives a killing frost comes.

STATE UPHOLDS PRIMARY LAW

Minnesota Supreme Court Holds Measure Constitutional—Candidates to be Active.

Minneapolis.—The non-partisan primary law has been held constitutional by the state supreme court. It had been attacked as unconstitutional on five separate counts.

The law makes the following changes in the present system:

All county offices and all legislative offices are made non-partisan.

The primary election is changed from September to the third Tuesday in June.

The "Bull Moose" party is legalized and can nominate candidates in the primaries. No petition will be necessary this year, the necessary 5 per cent vote having been polled last year.

Nomination by petition for non-partisan offices after the primaries is prohibited.

Provision is made for the non-partisan election of county surveyors without a primary.

The position of Minnesota is unique, in that the election of the state legislature is placed on a non-partisan basis. This provision was incorporated in the law only after a bitter fight.

Many candidates have been waiting for the decision of the supreme court. The decision is expected to stimulate political activity. More men are expected to file for the legislature and county offices. With the primaries a little over two months away no time will be lost by the officeseekers.

FERGUS FALLS BOY LUCKY

Court Holds He Is Lawful Owner of Coal Claim Which Is Worth Millions.

Fergus Falls.—News was received from Seattle that the United States land office had decided a long disputed coal claim case in favor of five claimants, one of whom is Joseph Frankoviz, a Fergus Falls boy, who will become a millionaire as a result of the decision.

Mr. Frankoviz went west five years ago and filed on a rich coal claim near Glacier, Wash. Its full value was not at that time appreciated. The tract consists of 160 acres underlaid with a fine grade of hard coal. As the time for completing title arrived, he arranged with a wealthy western man to furnish him with the money, about $3,000. The man waited until the last minute and then notified him he had decided not to go into it.

Fortunately, Mr. Frankoviz had written to his father, who is in business here, and the latter arrived on the scene in time to supply the money. Then the man who was to have furnished it filed upon the land as a timber claim, contending it was timber land, not mining land, and that Mr. Frankoviz' filing was illegal.

This led to a contest, which has been in progress ever since, and the land office now confirms Mr. Frankoviz' claim to the property.

FIGHT MOSQUITO WITH FISH

Farm School Expert Wants People of State to Co-operate in War on Pest.

St. Paul.—Don't wait to swat the mosquito; annihilate it before it attains swattable proportions.

That is the warning of C. W. Howard of the division of entomology at the university farm, chief of the section of field crop pests and parasite insects.

Prof. Howard intends to conduct a strenuous anti-mosquito campaign this spring, and he wants the public generally to co-operate. The only successful way to combat the mosquito is to fight the insect in its breeding place before it is far enough developed to do damage, says Prof. Howard.

Mosquitos are good for nothing, he declares, except to feed the fishes. Therefore, he says, propagate fish in greater numbers and stock every small stream and pond with them that they may contribute more substantially to the extermination of the winged pests.

State Land Sale at Bemidji.

Bemidji.—At the first sale of state land held here this year by Theodore Nelson of the state auditor's office, 2,025 acres were sold, bids going as high as $11.25 an acre. The total sales amounted to $12,600. The lowest price paid was $5 an acre and the average price was $6.25.

Royal Neighbors Meet.

Mankato.—The Royal Neighbors held their triennial state convention in this city, with a large attendance. They were entertained by members of the local lodge.

State Sells 5,400 Acres.

Grand Rapids.—The first state land sale for Itasca county took place here last week, Theodore Nelson of the state auditor's office being in charge. It was one of the best sales ever conducted in the county, both in point of acreage disposed of and price received. The sale price averaged $8.20 an acre, the 5,400 acres sold bringing a total of about $45,000. The highest price paid was $39.75 an acre for a forty-acre tract in the neighborhood of the new mining town of Fayton.

RICH SECTION IS TAPPED BY ROAD

NORTH MINNESOTA COUNTRY TO HAVE NEW RAILWAY IN SHORT TIME.

LAND IS DECLARED FERTILE

Red Lake Northern Will Connect Lake Itasca With Red Lake and Lake of the Woods, Also.

Bemidji.—Work is to be started soon on the Red Lake Northern railroad, which is to connect Lake Itasca with Red Lake and Lake of the Woods, giving tourists and vacationists easy access to the beautiful Itasca state forest and also to Red lake, the largest body of water in Minnesota.

Opens Section Up.

The road will also open for settlement one of the richest sections of northern Minnesota. What the Minnesota & International, the Greenbush branch of the Great Northern, the Duluth, Winnipeg & Pacific and the new line of the Soo have done within the past three and four years in their respective fields, the new line will do for a section of the state now all the way from ten to thirty miles from railway communication. Settlers now must "tote" in their supplies by team and move their crops the same way.

The nucleus for the proposed line is the logging road of the Red River Lumber company from Crooked Lake Junction, near Akeley, northeast to within a mile of Lake Itasca, and an abandoned spur of the same company extending south from Fletcher Junction near Shevlin, almost to the state forest.

Residents Are Promoters.

The promoters of the road who are mainly residents of Beltrami, Clearwater and Hubbard counties, but are not yet in the capitalist class, have interested J. E. Coon of Youngstown, Ohio, in their venture and expect great results. Mr. Coon has gained wealth and fame by building rural lines and placing them on their feet ready to be taken over by some large system. Of late he has devoted himself to suburban lines in Ohio and neighboring states, but he began his railroad work in Nebraska and is familiar with railroad construction in the west.

By building about ten miles of new track connecting the two spurs of the Red River Lumber company, a railroad sixty miles long and making the Itasca park accessible both from the north and the south and opening valuable farming land will be a reality.

The country is settled to some extent and several farmers in that section have prospered even without railroad conveniences.

Route of New Road.

North of Fletcher Junction the new line will enter the pine country south and west of big Red lake with its long sweep from the southwest to the northeast of thirty-five miles. For many miles the road will skirt the western shore of this large body of water and will then mount a ridge or watershed extending due north to Warroad on Lake of the Woods.

This ridge is said by those who made the preliminary survey to be ideal for railroad construction, as there are few if any streams to cross and no engineering difficulties to be solved. From Fletcher Junction to Warroad is ninety-two miles in a direct line, but the railroad will be somewhat longer.

Beyond the Red Lake district the country is gridironed with drainage ditches which are reclaiming what is declared to be the best land in the state that is still on the market. Along each ditch mile for mile there is a good road. This means that settlers, the real home builders, will swarm over the country at the first opportunity. Much of this land belongs to the state, but thousands of acres are subject to homestead entry, so the home-seeker has two ways of becoming a freeholder.

Murder Mystery Indicated.

Winona.—The Mississippi river, in giving up the body of Patrick R. Bennett, thirty-five years old and a resident of Fulton, Ill., ended a four months search and afforded the authorities say a murder mystery. The body was found floating in the river a few miles north of Winona on the Wisconsin side. Bennet disappeared in November when returning to his work as foreman on track construction for the Burlington road at Cachrane, Wis., after a visit at his home.

TIN CANS FOR PLANTS

GROW MORE RAPIDLY THAN IN ORDINARY POTS.

Great Advantage Is That It Is Easier to Maintain Nearly Constant Moisture Content Without Rapid Drying of Soil.

(By E. WILCOX.)

It has long been observed that many young seedling plants grow more rapidly and with greater vigor in tin cans than in ordinary florist's pots. In order to obtain further information on this subject and to determine the cause of the difference in growth, a set of experiments was carried out, by the writer, the general results of which will be given here.

Young uniform seedlings were planted in ten cans and also in ten pots. Five of the cans and five of the pots were coated with paraffine to eliminate any effect which the containers themselves might have on plant growth. The same amount of soil was used and the treatment as to watering was uniform and the same care was given to each. The plants were as near uniform as possible at the start. At two months of age the plants in two of the pots more porous than the rest were 3½ inches high, those in the three medium porous pots 4½ inches, those in the paraffine pots 5⅛ inches, those in the paraffine tins 6¼ inches, those in the untreated tins 7½ inches. The height and vigor of the plants showed a regular series of graduations, increasing in size as the evaporation from the container decreased.

The great advantage of using tin cans rather than porous pots seems to rest in the fact that in tins it is easier to maintain a nearly constant moisture content without a rapid drying of the soil about the growing roots. This results in a more rapid and vigorous growth. Since nearly one-half of the evaporation from pots takes place through the side of the pot, the movement of this part of water is necessarily in a horizontal direction. Root growth responds to the direction of the water movements in soil. Therefore, the roots reach the side of the container more quickly and in greater numbers in pots than in tin cans. After watering, the soil rapidly dries by escape of water through the side of the pot, thus leaving the young rootlets too dry. By the shrinkage of the soil away from the side of the pot in drying, a space is formed into which the water runs upon the next watering. The roots are thus alternately exposed to the air and submerged in water. In tin cans these conditions do not occur. No water can escape through the tin. The moisture content of the whole ball of soil is uniform and consequently the roots distribute themselves uniformly through the mass.

When used in growing plants, tin cans show quite extensive disintegration within a year. Under the influence of oxygen, the soil solution and plant acids, salts of tin, zinc and iron are formed from the can and solder. The growing tips of rootlets come in contact with the side of the can, and are in position to absorb these mineral salts. Naturally the salts of the tin and zinc in tin cans must be in extreme dilution. Under these conditions tin and zinc are known to stimulate plant growth to some extent.

On account of the flaring tops of pots, they occupy more space than tins. The growth of plants in tins is faster than in pots, for the reason that a uniform moisture content is more easily maintained in tins. We find in practice that plants in tin cans will thrive well when watered only every third day, under conditions where pots require watering every day. This brings about an economy in time and labor.

Best Soil.

After the tomato plants start to grow they should be gone through very carefully and all of the suckers removed, so that the strength will go to the main stalk. This will cause the fruit to ripen much better.

Tomatoes will grow on almost any kind of soil, but it must be made very rich by the use of good, well rotted stable manure. A good grade of fertilizer may also be applied to the base of the plant and then worked into the soil.

Muck lands are not at all practical for growing tomatoes, because they make too large a growth of vines, and, consequently, do not yield as much fruit as when grown on heavy soil.

Making Charcoal.

Where small flocks are kept charcoal may be easily provided by filling the cook stove with hard wood then shutting it up closely. Take the coals out as soon as charred through, put them in a sack cold, and break by pounding with the flat side of an ax. The dust may be utilized in chicken bread with good results.

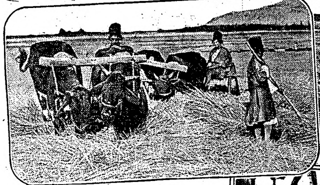
THE PLANK USED TO FLATTEN THE FIELD AND COVER THE SEED

AGRICULTURE IN SOUTHERN PERSIA

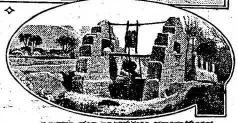
By A. HEINICKE



THRESHING

WINNOWING THE LAST OF A STACK

BRINGING IN THE CHAFF



A WELL FOR ARTIFICIAL IRRIGATION

CIVILIZATION has as yet made little progress in Persia. Western modern inventions in agricultural machinery and scientific methods of cultivating have passed over this country without leaving any impression on the farmers. The land is tilled in much the same way as in the days of Noah! The simplest and most primitive tools and implements are still employed to break up and prepare the soil. The plow, drawn by a pair of zebus, is a very crude affair. The share, made of soft iron imported from Sweden, is attached to rough wooden bars made by the village carpenter, and the plow is fastened to the heavy yoke by a chain. The soil is merely scratched on the surface, for the depth to which the share penetrates depends entirely on the physical exertion of the driver, who is often merely a youth. As soon as the rainy season sets in, generally somewhere about November, field work begins. Only two kinds of grain are grown in Fars, wheat for bread and barley for the food of the horses, donkeys and mules, though now it is also often used for baking purposes by the poorer classes. When the seed has been sown, a plank, five feet long by one and a half feet broad, pressed down by the weight of the driver, who stands on it, is driven over the ground to level it and to cover the seed so that it shall not be washed out when the fields are flooded by artificial irrigation. If the rains are good and plentiful, the young green blades soon show above ground; but if the nourishing element fails, artificial irrigation must be resorted to, and the few springs which exist in the Shiraz valley become worth a good deal of money.

Water is scarce in southern Persia, and has to be bought by most farmers throughout a dry season. On specified days in the week each field owner gets his supply for certain hours. The fields are then flooded, and to retain the water as much as possible each division is crossed by numbers of dams, two feet high, which confine the water, and in this way the earth is thoroughly soaked. Where running water is not obtainable, wells and underground channels are dug. From the wells, some of which are as much as 60 or 100 feet deep, the water is drawn by horses or other animals. A rope attached to the harness runs over a wooden wheel on a gentry above the well mouth. The "bucket" consists of the skin of a sheep or other quadruped, from the neck of which the water flows into a basin level with the ground, and then through narrow channels to the growing crops. These wells can be seen and the squeaking noise of the wooden wheels heard throughout the land. The canals, very often many miles long, are covered aqueducts, through which the water is led from the mountains to the plains and villages. The soil thrown up in digging these passages form mounds at the mouths of the shafts, which are sunk at intervals of 25 or 30 yards. The digging of these canals is a special trade, and the secret of their construction is guarded jealously by the men who earn their living in this manner.

The crops begin to ripen and harvesting starts towards July in the Shiraz valley, but earlier as one goes further south. The simple sickle is the only reaping implement used all over the vast country. When the crop is reaped it is not tied into sheaves, but is merely stacked up. When threshing time arrives, the simplest of machines appears on the scene. It is combined thresher and chaff-cutter. Between two broad wooden runners there is a pair of wooden rollers, in which short, wide, blunt knife blades are fixed. The upper part consists of four wooden uprights, on which a board is mounted as a seat for the driver. A pair of zebus drag this machine over the straw, which is spread flat on the ground, and is cut, or, rather, broken, up by the constantly rotating knives, while the pressure of the runners separates the grain from the husks. The weight of the driver supplies the necessary pressure. It takes eight or ten days to thresh out a stack, and when this is finished, if the wind is blowing freshly, the winnowing can begin. Again a very simple instrument, merely a wooden fork, is all that is used by the peasants. The monsoon, which blows in August and September over southern Persia, plays an important part in this proceeding. The winnowers start on the weather side of the threshed stack, tossing the straw into the air with their forks, the breeze blows the light chaff several yards to leeward, where it collects in a heap, while the heavy grain falls at the feet of the workers, and in this rough-and-ready manner the separation of the grain from the chaff is effected. The remaining operations of harvesting are very simple. The chaff is baled up in large, specially made nets, and brought on donkeys to the villages, while the grain follows in bags on the backs of camels or donkeys. The poor people are now allowed to glean over the fields, sifting the dust and gathering such grain and chaff as are left. Before the grain goes to the mill it is cleaned once more in a stone mortar with heavy wooden pestles, to get rid of the remaining husks. The Persian wheat bread is sold in big, flat, pancake-like pieces called sangak (from sang, the stone), from the fact that it is baked in an oven with a floor of heated pebbles. As it is so thin, it is baked through into crust, and tastes best while still hot. As the poorer classes all over the south of Persia live on nothing else but bread, the harvest means everything to them, and the price of wheat is a very serious matter. Bread riots break out if prices reach the famine point, and are a source of much trouble to the authorities. Many a governor has had to face them, and therefore it is the aim of every ruler in Fars as soon as he enters the gates of its capital to fix a low price for the bread, which means that all the poorer classes praise him and stand by his side while the big landowners grumble and intrigue against him to get him removed to some other district.

Old-Fashioned Agricultural Implements

Times have changed in agriculture, as in many other things, and at the present day we can hardly realize the difficulties that beset the farmer upwards of a century ago. Early spring was often a trying time for him, when his supplies of cattle food were apt to become exhausted before the new grass appeared. There were then no turnips, mangolds, oil-cake, soy beans or similar foods to be procured, and he had sometimes great difficulty in keeping his cattle from starvation, especially in the late districts. It is difficult to believe, but it is nevertheless true, that in parts of Scotland the cattle were at times so weak in spring from want of food that they were unable to rise from their stalls when the new grass did come. The custom therefore arose for farmers in a neighborhood to meet together and go from farm to farm for the purpose of carrying the helpless cattle out to the fields. This was termed the cattle lifting, a much more humane method of "cattle lifting" than that which used to prevail on the borders.

In the wilder parts of Scotland, where gorse or furze was plentiful, the young shoots were often used in spring as a supplementary food for both cattle and horses. The shoots were cut down and then removed to the farm to be there crushed into a rough pulp which could be eaten by the cattle. It was eagerly devoured by them, and they throve upon it. Cows gave richer milk when they were supplied with crushed gorse, and the milk was free from unpleasant flavor, such as other green winter foods sometimes induce. Horses, too, relished the food.

Great faith was placed in the nutritive value of whin shoots. Indeed, so popular did whin diet become, that fields, especially where the soil was dry and light, were set aside for the whin crop, the seeds being sown in drills in March, so that the shoots became ready for use in the autumn of the following year. For several years in succession forage was obtained from the original crop.

There were several methods employed for pulping the gorse. In small farms, where only a limited quantity was needed, the method usually adopted was to lay the young shoots on a flat stone or block of wood and hammer them with a mallet similar to that now used for driving in paling posts. Sometimes one end of the mallet was fitted with iron blades for chopping the gorse, while the other end was flat for pounding it. Otherwise a "rammer" or "bruiser" might be employed, an instrument consisting of a "shank of wood, three feet eight inches in length, a bulged out part to give the instrument weight on being used, and a base which is contracted into a square, and shod with an iron shoe embracing parallel iron cutters one inch asunder and three inches deep, and sharpened at their lower edge."

These methods, however, entailed too much manual labor where gorse was used in considerable quantity. In such case a gorse, furze or whin mill, as it was variously called in different districts, was utilized. The whin mill was built after one of two types; the most common consisted of a circular stone, shaped somewhat like a millstone, standing on edge, with approximately a diameter of four feet and a thickness of a foot. In the center of the stone a hole was cut, through which a shaft about 14 feet long was fixed. On end of the shaft was attached to an iron pin firmly fixed into an earth-fast stone, and the other end was fitted with tackling to which a horse could be yoked. The gorse shoots were then thrown into a circular trough or course, where they were crushed as the mill-stone slowly revolved. The farmer occasionally stirred them up with a hay-fork and sprinkled them with water to facilitate the crushing process. Crushing went on for about a couple of hours, by which time the gorse was sufficiently pulped to be eaten by the cattle.

In the second type of mill another form of stone, shaped somewhat like a field-roller, was utilized. This pattern was not so common as the wheel-shaped. The roller revolved on a flat circular course paved with stones, and had one end rather thicker than the other to enable it more readily to turn round the circle.

In process of time these gorse mills gradually fell into disuse. As the land became better populated, gorse became less plentiful and cattle food more abundant. The introduction of turnips, too, provided a plentiful supply of food in spring, when it had formerly been very scarce. Farmers, moreover, grudged the amount of labor entailed in preparing the gorse, and were not unwilling that the apparatus should fall into decay.

PIMPLES ON FACE AND ARMS

411 Howard St., Dayton, Ohio.—"About a year ago my face, neck, arms and back were beginning to become afflicted with pimples and blackheads. My pimples would get very large and appear to come to a head. If I tried to open them the pain would be terrible, but nothing could be taken from them. They itched very badly; I suffered terribly from itching. After scratching, the pimples would swell and after the swelling was gone my face would become very red and remain so for some time. My clothing caused the itching to be worse. When it was warm it was utterly impossible to sleep.

"I used a cream and the more I used the worse they got. Shortly after, I read the advertisement of Cuticura Soap and Ointment and determined to use them. The itching stopped almost immediately. This was about three months ago and I am entirely cured now." (Signed) Miss Marguerite E. Jacobs, Jan. 13, 1913.

Singing for Advertisement.

He had obtained a place in an estate agent's office, and was doing everything he could for the interests of his employer.

The other evening he was at a social gathering, and was asked to sing. He responded with "Home, Sweet Home." His friends were a little surprised at the selection, but he was heartily applauded. Stepping forward, he said:

"I am glad you like the song. There is nothing like 'Home, Sweet Home,' and let me say that the company I represent is selling homes on terms to suit everybody, within 40 minutes' ride of the city. Everybody ought to have a home. If you don't want to live in one of these houses yourself it's the chance of your life for an investment."

It doesn't matter so much what you hear about a thing, it's what you know that counts. And correct knowledge is most likely to come from personal experience.

"About a year ago," writes a N. Y. man, "I was bothered by indigestion, especially during the forenoon. I tried several remedies without any permanent improvement.

"My breakfast usually consisted of oatmeal, steak or chops, bread, coffee and some fruit.

"Hearing so much about Grape-Nuts, I concluded to give it a trial and find out if all I had heard of it was true.

"So I began with Grape-Nuts and cream, soft boiled eggs, toast, a cup of Postum and some fruit. Before the end of the first week I was rid of the acidity of the stomach and felt much relieved.

"By the end of the second week all traces of indigestion had disappeared and I was in first rate health once more. Before beginning this course of diet, I never had any appetite for lunch, but now I can enjoy the meal at noon time."

400,000 Settlers a Year

Immigration figures show that the population of Canada increased during 1913, by the addition of 400,000 new settlers from the United States and Europe. Most of these have gone on farms in provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Lord William Percy, an English Nobleman, says:

"The possibilities and opportunities offered by the Canadian West are so infinitely greater than those which exist in England, that it seems absurd to think that people should be impeded from coming to the country where they can most easily and certainly improve their position.

New districts are being opened up, which will make accessable a great number of homesteads in districts especially adapted to mixed farming and grain raising.

THE GIRL from PROSPERITY

By GEORGE RANDOLPH CHESTER

(Copyright by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

When James E. Carroll, his attire fully keyed up to his pink tie, swaggered into the Hotel Belveigh barber shop, the boss barber loafing over at the table of Bessie Williams grinned in spite of his present ill humor.

"Pipe the village cut-up," he observed.

The Manicure Girl surveyed the newcomer with a keen eye.

"No, Billy," she replied, "it's the village sport."

"Whatever he is," insisted Billy, "he's a Hick and looking for a ten-cent shave."

Again the girl surveyed the newcomer critically.

"No," she once more dissented, "I'll bet you the size of the tip that he tips you."

"The same which would be a fine and wise bet for me to make, I think not," observed Billy, and added a forcible word or so under his breath as he started forward, for Mr. James E. Carroll, having looked down the line of Greeks and Italians who stood invitingly at their empty chairs, gave a glance at the only American barber in the place, and climbed into the only chair which had no attendant.

"I'll take a round trip," he affably observed as Billy slipped the sleeves of the shaving apron over his arms.

"Shave, sir?" coldly inquired Billy, who, nevertheless, had understood perfectly what his customer meant.

"The whole howling hippodrome," said young Mr. Carroll, unabashed. "Do everything you know how."

"Just watch me make this fresh wop's pocket change shrink down to the edge of his return ticket," growled Billy to the Manicure Girl as he made a pretext to go past her table for fresh towels.

"I wouldn't have your ingrowing grouch for money," laughed the girl.

"You would if you ached to furnish a flat and got turned down every time you mentioned it," he complained.

"I told you that was barred," she informed him. "I think I see myself in an East Harlem flat, with cheesecloth curtains on the front windows and a garbage can on the fire escape, counting how many wienerwursts we get for a dime."

It was in consequent savageness that Billy began upon the task of giving his country customer "a round trip." He cut that hearty young gentleman's hair, and singed and shampooed and dandruffined it, he shaved him and massaged his head and his face, he put upon him drenches of every bottled thing in his possession, then he grinned, yanked up the chair, jerked off the towels and handed over his largest check. But Mr. Carroll was scarcely interested.

"Is that all you can do?" he asked.

"We have a chiropodist, but he's not on duty just now," snarled Billy; "while you're waiting, though, you can get manicured."

"Me for the manicure. I've heard about 'em," said Mr. Carroll; "and just as a sporting proposition I'm going to sample a sample of everything there is in New York."

"Just go right ahead and see if New York cares," Bill advised him.

"I don't care whether New York cares," returned Mr. Carroll, largely, "and that's where I've got the best of New York."

As a matter of living up to that largeness he presented Billy with half a dollar, then he swaggered across the shop to the cashier's desk, flaunting a twenty-dollar bill in his hand and glancing with speculative assurance at the row of manicure girls. Tess, who was quite universal in her tastes, used her large eyes freely, but with the usual negative effect. Nobody could be persuaded to believe them. Instead of succumbing to the girl who owned them, Mr. Carroll's gaze roved right on over her head to the deceptively demure Miss Williams.

"Mr. Smarty from Smartville," commented Tess with a toss of her head.

"I don't want him," retorted Miss Williams, "If I draw Johnny Fresh I'll give him the salting down of his life. It'll be a real quiet convention we'll hold, with me in the steam roller part."

As a preliminary to this process, when Mr. Carroll sat down at her table she spread out both his hands before her and surveyed them critically; then she smiled with an apparent attempt to conceal it; then she looked demurely up. Mr. Carroll was red. Some uncomfortable thought held him silent throughout the entire operation, checking any desire for conversation and killing any inclination whatsoever toward flippancy. When he got up to go he looked at the change dubiously, then at the girl, then back at the change and again grew red. His dilemma was obvious. He did not know whether or not it was the proper thing to tip a lady. Sometimes Miss Williams took tips and sometimes she refused them. This time she accepted before one was really offered.

"Thank you," said she very sweetly.

He pushed a quarter toward her tentatively and she swept it nonchalantly into the little drawer of her table.

"Thank you," she said again, still very sweetly.

Those were the only four words that had been spoken during the entire event.

"How did you tame him, Bess?" asked the other girl.

"Made him see the size of his hands," explained Miss Williams with a shrug. "You can do that with any of them that have big ones, and after that they'll lay down and roll over and jump through hoops at the mere glance of command."

The next day he came again, but with not nearly so much assurance. Again he took Billy's chair, but there was very little aggressiveness about him.

"What will you have a sample of today?" asked Billy.

"Shave," said Mr. Carroll, wearily, as he lay back in the chair.

When Billy turned him loose he went over to Miss Williams and spread out his hands upon her table, dropping opposite to her with a dead-tired air.

"You don't want me to treat your nails again?" she objected.

"Sure," he said. "I came in on purpose."

"This is one of the good things you can overdo," she told him. "If I'd give those nails the full course so soon you'd have to get a new set."

He was quite dismal about it.

"Can't you just fuss around with them a little bit, then?" he inquired. "I'm so lonesome I could go to jail for company."

"Maybe I could finish yesterday's job a little," she returned. "It would be cheating, but I don't mind," and she studied them carefully.

The fact of the matter was that Mr. James E. Carroll was quite palpably unhappy, and the Manicure Girl, who always wore her claws unsheathed for "fresh" people, could not withhold comfort from unhappy ones.

"What's the matter? Hasn't New York been clubby with you?" she asked, as she went gingerly to work.

"No," he complained, "the town's too slow. There's more fun out in Prosperity, Indiana, where I came from."

"That isn't what ails you. There's a girl back in Prosperity."

"There's half a dozen of them," he grinned.

"Yes?" she inquired, and looked him over carefully. "There's only one. I'll put a little bet down on it; a bag of peanuts against a package of chewing gum."

He looked a long time at the Manicure Girl's imported pompadour, then he called a boy and handed him a quarter.

"Bring a package of chewing gum," he ordered.

That's when Miss Williams began not to dislike him so much.

"Yes," he went on by and by. "There is just one girl back in Prosperity, that is, one worth mentioning, and I'd give a hundred dollars if she was here."

"So much as a hundred left," she asked, in apparent surprise; "and you here two days?"

"It does melt pretty fast," he confessed, smiling, "but I'm good for a few days longer. I brought between three and four hundred dollars with me."

"Gee!" exclaimed Miss Williams. "What will they do for a circulating medium out there?"

"Oh, there's some left, I guess," he told her, "but not among the gang. You see, I won this in a poker game, the biggest one we ever had in town."

"My, what a wicked little sport!" she gasped. "I guess you're the horrible example in Prosperity. I guess they won't let you come to the church sociables, nor the husking bees, nor anything. What does the girl think of it?"

"She doesn't know anything about it," he returned rather soberly. "If she found it out, I don't think she'd like it very much."

Miss Williams liked him even better for the seriousness with which he considered this phase of the matter.

"Of course, she's pretty," she suggested by and by.

It was good to see his face light up.

"I call her Reddy, but her hair isn't really red," he explained. "It's a dark brown, that seems to flare up copper colored sometimes when the sun shines through it; and she has the brownest of brown eyes, and the reddest of red lips, and the whitest of white teeth, and the pinkest cheeks; and—"

"Sure," she interrupted; "I know the kind. You can find her on the front page of any of the twenty-six best sellers, and on the covers of all the magazines when they haven't anything special to feature; and I suppose after this lonesome little Seeing-New-York trip all by yourself, you'll go back home and marry the girl in the last chapter."

"You bet I will," he returned, decidedly, and when he got up to go he was feeling a lot more cheerful.

The boss barber was not, however.

"Some chummy with Mr. Yap from Yapville," he sneered to the Manicure Girl.

"He's a real nice little Hick, Billy," she insisted, "but he was as solemn as classic music; and you know me. Any time I see anybody look mooeyed I've got to be 'Busy Bessie, the Cheerful-Chirker-up.'"

"So I notice," said Billy, "but you usually manage to spring that gag on the strangers."

"You needn't worry, Billy," she retorted. "Not that you've got any mortgage on the premises, but that I hate to see you taking all that spite out on the poor Dagoes. Considering the couple of hundred dollars my pet Hick has left, he's not likely to be in any more."

She was mistaken. In a week he was in again, more aggressive even than he had been the first time. Someway there was a change in him. The noisy tie was gone, he had a new hat, and he carried himself a shade "scrappy," as she expressed it.

"Hello!" she hailed him. "I thought you'd gone back to the girl in Prosperity."

"Not yet," he said. "I don't think I'm going back except when I go after the girl."

"No?" she asked. "What's holding you?"

"Money," he replied gleefully, and displayed a huge roll of bills.

"Who died in your family?" she asked.

"It isn't that," he laughed "but New York has too much loose coin for a man to leave. I've found out how to take its wealth away from it."

"Good!" she exclaimed. "Little old New York needs a trimming. Go after it and get it good. But how are you doing it? I'm greedy to know."

"Oh, just speculating a little in stock and grains," he replied.

"Reuben, Reuben!" she gasped. "You'll be the death of me yet."

"You're mistaken in the name," he retorted. "It's Hiram H. Hanks of Hawkinsville, or possibly Josh Dill of Picklesburg."

She surveyed him with some disfavor.

"My, but I bet they miss you in Prosperity. What a merry wag you must be when you're going good."

"Regular clown," he grinned. "Just for that I'll make you listen to my real name."

From his pocket he drew a stamped and addressed letter and pointed to the "James E. Carroll" written in the corner under the Belveigh card.

"And here's the girl," he said, pointing to the address with a strange combination of diffidence and assertiveness. "Elizabeth Ruth Emery. Don't you think it's some pumpkins of a name?"

"It's a shine to Elizabeth E. Carroll; and for that I suppose I get paid double."

"You sure do," he agreed. "I'm writing her a dandy letter. I'm telling her all about the good business I'm in and how much money I'm making. Why, say, do you known I'm ahead over five hundred dollars since I saw you?"

The Manicure Girl pushed back his hand, and hastily reached down his hat from the hook overhead.

"Run!" she exclaimed. "Get away quick before they find out you've got it, or they'll take it away if they have to strangle you."

He merely grinned.

"Oh, I don't know," he said confidently. "I've noticed that the people who do gouge its money out of New York, and keep it, come from places like Prosperity, Indiana. There's a lot more where this five hundred grew, and I'm going to pick it."

"Poor child," she commiserated. "I can see your bumps on the way."

"Maybe so," he admitted, "but let me tell you, little lady, I'll be having the time of my life until they reach me, and if they clean me I've made my three hundred stretch a long, long way."

He held his head high and his big shoulders square as he walked out, and Billy snorted; but he got no satisfaction out of the Manicure Girl.

"Hick, isn't he, Billy? Yap, I guess! Also a pin-head and a few other things; but just the same, he came here to spend three hundred dollars, and he's been here over a week, and he's got about six hundred of it left. I call that real Marathon blood myself. If you'd go out and turn a few tricks like that you could come down to your daily toil in a buzz-wagon."

"He'll be down on the Bowery panhandling before he gets through," growled Billy.

It did not seem to happen right at once, however. Every time James E. Carroll came in he looked more prosperous, and he told the Manicure Girl each time of how much money he was making as a "grain and stock operator." Every time it was more and more. He didn't exactly boast about it; he was only gleeful in a large, childish way, and it is doubtful if he gloated to any one else as he did to Miss Williams. He had constituted her his confidante from the beginning, and seemed to feel it a solemn duty, as well as a joy, to come in and let her know his progress. It was strange, too, to see his transition from a country boy to an all-rounder. His clothing now was up to the minute, his talk up to the second, and everything about him was right on the dot; but in place of the rugged pink and brown of his cheeks he now had a massaged complexion, and there were pouches under his eyes.

The Manicure Girl came in one day laughing and still half vexed.

"Guess where I saw James E. Carroll," she said to Tess; "in a big red racer with three stunning chorus girls. I was with Frank—you know him; head rusher over at Churley's.

"'It's Plunger Jimmy Carroll,' Frank told me.

"'Gee!' I said. 'Has he got so far along that Broadway knows him?'

"'Sure,' said Frank. 'He's the hottest member on the main stem. He's just Jimmy, along the line. All the late places know him and all the follies and Fluffies know him.' How's that for a pace?"

"He got the quickest education of anybody ever I saw," commented Tess. "If he was mine I'd have a sparkling rock as big as the head of a hat pin out of him."

"You've had plenty of chances," retorted Miss Williams, "but I don't notice that Tiffany effect on you."

Mr. Carroll came in the next day, beaming.

"You ought to see my new car," he told the Manicure Girl as he sat down at her table.

"I saw it yesterday," she snapped. "You were peddling a fine load of shrimps."

"Weren't they the class of the card?" he laughed, and seemed quite proud of it. "That flossy blonde on the outside was Beauty Phillips, the sensation of 'The Pink Canary.' She's going to star next season, and Angel Jimmy may back the show."

"Fine for Beauty Phillips!" said the Manicure Girl, and then she was angrily silent for a few minutes. "Look here, Mr. James E. Carroll," she suddenly demanded; "when did you write last to the girl in Prosperity?"

"By George, I—I intended to write her last night," he stammered. "I—I haven't been answering her letters as promptly as I ought, and that's a fact."

"When — did — you — write — to —her!" she insisted.

"Well, it's been—why, confound it, it's over three weeks," he finally confessed.

"And then I'll bet it was on one page," she snapped back at him. "You told her you were too busy to write, only just those few lines, but would write more tomorrow."

That time she made him blush.

"Now," she sternly went on, "you go right out of here and write to that girl; and keep it up, or don't ever come back."

"Cross my heart, hope to die if I don't," he promised.

The next time he came in he was leading a particularly ugly bulldog.

"Isn't that a lovely mut?" he asked as he tied the end of the chain to his chair.

"What's it good for besides killing?" she asked, eyeing the creature with supreme disfavor.

"It's to make an already peerless beauty look still more like a queen," he told her, complacently. "I examined something like two tons of dogs to find this specimen. I bought it to take my place in the honk wagon alongside of Beauty Phillips, when I'm busy throwing a harpoon into the wheat pit."

"Did you write that letter yet?" she demanded.

"Yes," he answered shortly.

"It's about time to write another one, isn't it?"

"No," he replied, defiantly. "I'm not going to write any more."

She looked at him and shook her head, but she said nothing, and her very silence angered him.

"What's the use?" he hotly went on, and she divined that, after all, his anger was more at himself than at her. "Why should I hide the facts from myself any longer. I've grown away from Prosperity."

"I should say you had," she agreed. "If Prosperity could know how you've changed for the worse, it wouldn't recognize you on the street."

"It's not my world any more," he continued, paying no attention to her interruption, "and the people are not of my world."

"So you hinted before," she reminded him; "but that doesn't keep you from writing to the girl."

He hesitated a moment.

"But her letters do," he finally said. "I got one from her yesterday. It was about nothing but the new coat of paint on the Baptist church, and about there being an epidemic of measles in the town, and about—"

"That's about far enough," she told him, furiously angry. "Awful drivel, isn't it? I can see the little fool out there now, sitting down to write about such trifling things in her ignorance. Red hair I think you said she had, and red cheeks, and you called her Reddy. Coarse, ignorant, country person, no doubt. Well, I don't blame you for shaking her, now that you have got up among the real people, real ladies like Beauty Phillips and her crowd, and real gentlemen of the sort that loaf around the hotel bars on Broadway. You're right to cut her dead right now. Why, she might sometime come to New York, and if she should happen to meet you on Broadway when you were with some of your swell friends, and should nod to you, you'd be disgraced for life. I'll bet she'd be a scream on Broadway, with her funny clothes and her funny little hat and her red complexion."

"That'll be about all," he said, as he jumped up and unwound his dog chain; and his face had turned suddenly pale. "My ideas have changed somewhat about things back in Prosperity, but I can't stand for having that girl roasted, even in a joke."

It was over a month before he came in again, and the Manicure Girl had missed him. Now she saw at once that something was wrong. He was nervous and abstracted, though he tried to be his old flippant self. With the shrewd eyes of Miss Williams upon him he kept thinking of one thing while he talked of another, asked questions without listening to the answers, then asked the same questions again.

"How much did you lose?" she finally asked him.

He stared at her in wonder.

"How did you know? Where did you hear?" he slowly questioned.

"You've been telling me ever since you came in," she said.

"I expect I have," he admitted. "Well, they got to me in lumps and gobs. For the past month I think I was about the only bull in a bear market. I went down the greased incline so fast it smoked from the friction. The first of this week I had to sell both automobiles."

"I can see the headlight and the glimmer studded watch going next," she commented, with a shake of her head. "I suppose they've about got all that automobile money by now."

"Suppose again," he retorted. "They did get nearly all of it at first, but the market changed at last, and I've made a little money since. If I'd close out now I'd have at least three thousand."

"Tell me where it is and I'll go get it for you," offered the Manicure Girl, hastily. "You take that money and go right back to Prosperity, Indiana; buy the village dry goods emporium; marry that girl; settle down and get fat. Then this experience will have done you good."

He shook his head.

"I can never go back there," he said; "never! That's not my world, I tell you. I'll make back the money I lost. I've learned a few tricks in the last couple of weeks."

"Oh, New York will educate you," she owned; "but, you know, college graduates don't amount to much."

"Never mind," he insisted. "I've played this game to win before, and I can do it again. Watch me."

"You'd better send at least one thousand dollars of that money to the girl back home to plant under the cellar stairs," she suggested.

She watched him narrowly, and then she smiled to herself. The mention of the girl in Prosperity did not seem to annoy him this time.

"That much money wouldn't scare her, at any rate," he said, smiling. "She's rather well-to-do for a country town. She's an orphan and lives with her married sister. But don't you worry about that thousand. I can use that to elegant advantage myself."

The next time she saw him was on the street. He tried to pass on by with a nod, but she called to him and he came back reluctantly.

"What's the matter with you?" she demanded. "You look like a yesterday's three-cent bunch of soup vegetables."

He glanced down at himself ruefully. His clothes needed brushing and pressing, his shoes needed polishing, his face needed shaving.

"I'll give you four guesses," he offered, with an attempt at his old gayety.

"I only need one," she replied. "You wouldn't listen to your Aunt Bessie, and they got you."

"Yes," he admitted, "they got me and they got me good. I haven't a dollar."

"What are you going to do?"

"I don't know," he said, and, in spite of his attempt to carry it off manfully, there was a catch in his voice. The ginger was all out of him. "I'll get another start somehow, I guess."

"Oh, yes," she agreed. "Some of your friends are sure to help you get back on your feet again; Beauty Phillips, for instance."

"Hang Beauty Phillips!" he said.

"Such language!" she exclaimed, but nevertheless she secretly delighted in it, this time. "I guess you're about ready to go back to Prosperity," she decided.

He drew a sharp breath.

"I'd die first!" he declared. "I'll live some way, though. They always live," and he laughed bitterly. "I passed a group of just such men as I may become, sitting on the stone bench at Herald square; but I'll keep on living, I am sure of that."

He seemed to be afraid that he would not. He seemed to be afraid of himself, and suddenly Miss Williams saw with a shock that he was "one of the tragedy kind!" It set her to swift thought, and a sudden bold idea came to her.

"I believe I know of an opening for you," she said, with a suppressed gasp at her own temerity; "a partnership that would be about the best thing you ever had offered to you. Come around and see me next Monday afternoon."

"What kind of a business is it?" he asked eagerly, a new light of hope springing in his eyes.

"You mustn't ask questions," she warned him, "because I don't want to disappoint you. I feel very sure, though, that I can land it for you."

That afternoon between work she wrote a letter, a proceeding which always made the boss barber nervous.

Billy, however, managed to get a glimpse at the envelope before it was mailed, and felt better about it, for the letter was addressed to Elizabeth Ruth Emery, Prosperity, Indiana.

On Monday morning, Elizabeth Ruth Emery and her sister arrived, and Elizabeth Ruth sent down word that she would like to see Miss Williams. That young lady promptly went up to the room, and was confronted by a girl almost as pretty as Jimmy had tried to describe.

The two girls shook hands, and if there had been any distrust in the bosom of Miss Edwards it melted in a moment as she looked into the truthful eyes of Bessie Williams.

"Where is Mr. Carroll?" asked the girl from Prosperity, with trembling eagerness. "How ill is he? Has he a good doctor?"

"I'm his only doctor," responded Miss Williams, "and the only prescription I've given him was the one I wrote to you. You see, it isn't his body that's sick, it's his mind. Jimmy Carroll's a good boy, but he's a fool."

Miss Emery flushed a bit, indignantly, but her sister smiled.

"I suspected as much," she said. "I think your description is about right, Miss Williams. He is a good boy, and I'm afraid he is the rest of it."

"I guess he's cured of that," said Miss Williams, laughing, "but after all, he's no bigger fool than the crowd that put him on the reefs. He thought he could play the bucket shops, and no living man has ever kept at that and finished on the cozy side of it. For about a month he thought he owned New York, and now he's down and out; that's all. I tried to get him to go home, but he wouldn't go, so I sent for the sheriff."

The girl from Prosperity was nonplussed; also she was honest.

"I don't quite know whether to thank you for inducing me to take this trip or not," she said, a little coldly.

"Wait until you see Jimmy," responded Miss Williams easily, for she felt quite confident of the outcome.

It was about two o'clock when he came, looking worse than ever. He was pale now and also shabby, and she judged that maybe he was hungry, too, but he was shaved and his clothes were brushed. She looked at his hand. The ring was gone. He had made that sacrifice to appear neatly in case the "partnership chance" should come out right, and he was tremblingly eager to know if she had heard anything favorable.

She took him up to the girl from Prosperity just as he was. He will not be whiter when he is dead than he turned when he saw her. For a moment they just looked and looked. They were both trembling. Then slowly she held out her hands to him. Suddenly, with a sob, he dropped on his knees before her, there upon the parlor floor, and buried his head upon her hands.

Outside in the hall the Manicure Girl was dabbing her eyes with a pocket handkerchief and upbraiding herself.

"I certainly am the prize Weeping Winifred," she said, impatiently, as she hurried for the elevator.

HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Flying Hat Chased by Maiden and Many Men

NEW YORK.—There was a short but exciting chase in Times Square late the other afternoon when the homegoing matinee crowd filled the street. The victim of the prank of the wind was a tall, slender young woman who wore a slit skirt and carried a huge muff. Her hat was one of the latest effects in straw. It resembled an inverted soup plate, and was trimmed with a black lace ruffle and a single feather.

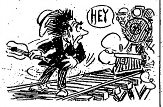
She was crossing the street going toward the subway entrance when a particularly spiteful gust of wind caught the hat, lifted it from her head, and sent it straight up into the air. A young man started to the rescue. He followed the erratic course of the hat with his face turned skyward. So did the owner of the hat. They met in a space between two snow piles in the street, and the young woman was almost knocked down.

Four more men and an elderly woman took up the rescue work while the youth was apologizing to the maiden. All this time the hat refused to come down. It would go soaring 50 feet up and then drop down, only to be caught again and sent upward. The owner of the hat grew very excited, and started on the chase after the collision, waving her great muff above her head. More men, all young ones, became interested in the pursuit of the runaway hat. Its course lay in a northerly direction, and the pursuers plodded gallantly through the snow in the street.

Half a hundred persons gathered along the curb, and several newsboys joined the chase. The hat, after performing spirals and other things in the air, finally came to the ground in a snowbank. Half the pursuers tried to capture it at the same time, but it was a newsboy who got possession of it. His reward was a smile.

Sacrifices Beloved Guitar and Saves His Life

ST. LOUIS, MO.—"Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast," perhaps, but it didn't help much to slacken the speed of a freight train which bore down upon Herman Oexner of Belleville as he walked across a long trestle on the Louisville & Nashville railroad early the other day.



Oexner had been attending a dance and was on his way home between midnight and dawn. His only companion was a much-beloved guitar. To lessen the loneliness of the walk he played, and as he played he sang, losing consciousness of all about him, and no doubt having dreams the while of some fair Juliet upon a balcony listening to his strains.

So engrossed was he in his music that he was well onto the trestle before he heard a noise in the rear, and, gazing back, saw the train. His muse was either not shifty enough or too fickle to offer advice in so urgent a case. She had temporarily departed, and for the moment the instinct of self-preservation was uppermost.

The beloved instrument was sacrificed, Oexner permitting it to drop over the edge of the trestle as he scrambled to safety on the end of a tie just as the train breezed past.

The danger over, he set about to discover the remains of his tried friend. He found it, 50 feet beneath, shattered against a rail of the Southern railroad tracks.

It had picked a hard spot on which to settle, and had poured out its last music in one dismal crash.

As Hard to Negotiate as a "Slide for Life"

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—The crossing at Pennsylvania and Washington streets was a slide for life as interesting to negotiate as the greased pole at a county fair. But this brother was of different ilk. He wore a pair of spats on big tan shoes, surmounted by a foot of gray striped trouser legs before the tailored edge of his fur collared overcoat shut off the view of the stripes. A roll brimmed, quarter bow derby kept in the aroma of bay rum that held the sandy hair in plastered perfection, and curves as proper as the curved handle of his hickory-rough walking stick. His companion was human.

"Entirely unnecessary, entirely so. If persons watched their footing and stopped walking about like chickens they would not fall in the street in this foolish way. To be sure it is extremely slippery, but falling is only a demonstration that they have not proper control of their equilibrium. Nothing but a matter of care, I say, nothing mo——"

Slisch-ch, plopp—splatter, and the immaculate was down in the center of the North Pennsylvania street car track and about two inches of melting snow. Pride had gone before the fall and the slippery car rail had lacked the politeness of the friend in not opposing his opinion. But the friend was human.

"As you were saying," he remarked, as he helped his friend to his feet, trying to overlook the fall—but the immaculate one only glared.

Dogs Are Always Dogs Even When One Is Bogus

CHICAGO.—Through the window of Karl Kahmann's shop at 2457 Lincoln avenue, a handsome, big-muscled bulldog gazed out the other night on passing traffic, calm and supercilious. He held his head at a haughty angle and the most exciting happenings on sidewalk and pavement did not stir him to the visible extent of a fraction of a wag of his fraction of a tail.

Presently came another bulldog of more active nature, willing to be friend and play or to be an enemy and fight. This second bulldog stopped in front of the window and wagged his tail tentatively. There was no answering wag. He growled. There came no answering growl.

Not even by a glance or a showing of teeth did the insolent, self-centered window dog recognize the existence of his canine brother in the street. It was a dead cut. Plate glass three-eighths of an inch thick stood between them, but the street dog forgot that in his wrath. He leaped at the throat of the offender. The glass crashed. Cut now physically as well as socially, the street dog closed in. The window dog tumbled over on his side with a hollow thud. The street dog, tearing at his throat, choked on a mouthful of sawdust. He had not been supercilious after all—only stuffed.

Kahmann, who is a taxidermist, is in need not only of a new show window but of a new window dog. He says he will make one out of the street dog if he catches him.

AMERICAN TO MANAGE ENGLISH RAILWAY

Henry W. Thornton, general superintendent of the Long Island railroad, has been selected as general manager of the Great Eastern railroad of England. Mr. Thornton entered the service of the Pennsylvania lines west of Pittsburgh on December 14, 1894, as draughtsman in the chief engineer's office of the Southwest system, and was appointed assistant engineer of construction of the Cleveland & Marietta railroad—one of the subsidiary lines of the Pennsylvania company, in May, 1895. He remained in that position until May, 1896, at which time he was engaged in topographical work in connection with surveys in southern Indiana, until August of the same year, when he was appointed assistant on the engineering corps of the Pittsburgh division of the Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Cincinnati & St. Louis railroad, remaining there until March, 1897. Then he was transferred and detailed in charge of a party running levels on the Southwest system, until June, 1897. He was next appointed supervisor in Columbus yard and occupied that position until November, 1897, when he was appointed assistant engineer of the Cincinnati division. He filled that position until the spring of 1899, when he was detached and assigned by the general manager to special work.

On November 1, 1899, Mr. Thornton was appointed engineer of maintenance of way of the Erie & Ashtabula division, and on March 1, 1901, he was appointed superintendent of the Marietta division of the Cleveland & Marietta railroad. In May, 1902, he was appointed superintendent of the Cleveland, Akron & Columbus railroad, and on December 23, 1902, was transferred to the Erie & Ashtabula division. On February 1, 1911, he was appointed general superintendent of the Long Island railroad, and on November 14, 1911, he was advanced to general superintendent.

MAY BE IRELAND'S VICEROY

It is almost definitely decided that Prince Arthur of Connaught is to be the first home rule viceroy of Ireland. There was some talk of his succeeding his father, the duke of Connaught, as governor general of Canada, but this will not now take place, unless the unionists are successful in preventing the government from establishing a parliament in Ireland.

Like all members of the Connaught family, Prince Arthur is extremely popular, and besides it is considered that he would make an able and responsible viceroy, while his nearness to the throne and his personal intimacy with the king would have a great effect in soothing unionist susceptibilities in Ireland.

It would be difficult for Irish society to boycott a viceregal court held by the first cousin and the niece of the sovereign, especially after the latter had visited Dublin in person to open the first Irish parliament, which he will do if that parliament is ever summoned. There is little prospect, however, of the home rule bill becoming law early the coming summer, as nationalists and liberals have often declared would be the case. It is now predicted that Ireland's fight for self-government will not be ended before next fall.

PLAYED TENNIS WITH THE SHAH

Few girls from the democratic ranks of American life are given a chance to win a tennis match from a foreign potentate. And when it comes to matching one's skill against that of so august and exclusive a royal personage as his majesty, the shah of Persia, the opportunity is rarer still.

"It happened this way," says Miss Lucy Russell, daughter of Charles Wells Russell, present minister from the United States to Persia. "We had a friend who was one of the tutors of the present shah, who, you know, is still under age. This friend, when he learned I was soon to return to America, asked if I would not like to try a game of tennis with his royal pupil. Of course I was pleased at the opportunity and accepted the invitation. I can truly say that the young shah appeared to greater advantage during that game than at any other time I had the privilege of seeing him during my stay in Persia. With older people, and on the occasions upon which he receives, the shah appears exceedingly diffident and austere. But on a tennis court he shows all the informality, friendliness and enthusiasm which you might expect from the average youth in every-day life. He is exceedingly fond of the game and plays it well."

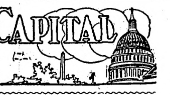
SLATED FOR NEW YORK POLICE HEAD

Politicians are discussing a report that George W. Perkins, financial backer of the Bull Moose party, stands ready to become police commissioner, if the position is offered to him, and many say they would not be surprised to learn that he will be appointed. On the other hand, they declare they will be surprised if Col. George W. Goethals, builder of the Panama canal, is the next police commissioner.

The report has already reached Albany that Mr. Perkins may get the office, and politicians there say it puts a different aspect on the police amendments contained in the bill now pending than when Colonel Goethals alone was mentioned to head the police department.

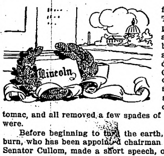
Mr. Perkins warmly supported the fusionists in the last campaign and contributed $5,000 to the campaign fund of Mayor Mitchel. Mr. Perkins also has worked for the passage of the police bill urged by Mr. Mitchel. Mayor Mitchel can appoint Mr. Perkins police commissioner regardless of whether the amendments are approved by the legislature.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS



Ground Broken for the Great Lincoln Memorial

WASHINGTON.—Ground was broken February 12 for the great memorial which is to be erected in Washington to Lincoln. As would have pleased the great president, the utmost simplicity marked the breaking of the ground.



The day was the one hundred and fifth anniversary of Lincoln's birth. There was no blare of trumpets, no pounding of drums and no burst of artillery salutes. The resident members of the Lincoln memorial commission, accompanied by Henry Bacon, designer of the memorial; M. F. Comer, Toledo, O., the contractor, and Col. W. W. Hart, engineer commissioner in charge of public buildings and grounds, met on the spot down on the "made" ground by the Potomac, and all removed a few spades of earth, and that was all the rites there were.

Before beginning to turn the earth, former United States Senator Blackburn, who has been appointed chairman of the commission in place of the late Senator Cullom, made a short speech, opening the exercises.

"This great memorial will show that Lincoln is now regarded as the greatest of all Americans," said Senator Blackburn, "and he is so held by the South as well as by the North. Today we let the country know that this great work has been begun and will be carried on steadily until its completion."

The site is on the direct line with the monument to Washington and the capitol and within easy view of the gates of Arlington, which it is planned to connect with the memorial by a memorial bridge.

Government Clerks Just as Selfish as Others

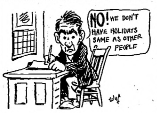
GOVERNMENT clerks are just as selfish as any other body of people that can be got together. They have been howling for years for a retirement law, which will make provisions for retirement at a certain age on one-half or two-thirds of their salary, and the same organization which is known as the "Retirement association" is demanding increased salaries all along the line. The pure selfishness of this United States Civil Service association shows in the fact that the clerks are unable to get together on any one suggestion for retirement. Scores of the younger clerks object to the monthly assessment plan for the purpose of securing an endowment fund on which aged clerks may be retired. Youth is always hopeful; and these younger clerks think that they will leave the government service long before the retirement age is reached, and then all the money that had been automatically taken from their monthly salaries would be lost to them. And they are strenuously opposed—these younger clerks are—to supporting in idleness any of the aged clerks, who could be immediately retired on part pay if such an endowment fund was established.

YOU'RE TOO SELFISH TO ENJOY GOOD HEALTH !!
WHY SHOULD I CONTRIBUTE, HEY ?

One of the finest examples of what may be accomplished without feeling any real loss of salary is shown in the United States Soldiers' home. This home, established in General Scott's time, just after the Mexican war, by an indemnity fund from Mexico, which nobody knew what to do with, is today the most magnificent piece of property in the District of Columbia. It can shelter over 5,000 men without crowding. It has magnificent white marble buildings with marble floors and walls, white marble auditorium and theater, a magnificent library building, a just as magnificent administration building, with a most beautiful cottage for the administration officials, great conservatories and herds of the very finest milch cows—in fact, everything on earth that the heart can wish for, and all done by simply reserving a small sum of 12 cents a month from every enlisted man's pay.

Few Holidays Observed in City of Washington

BE it known that in the District of Columbia mighty few of the patriotic holidays are observed. For instance, congress sits on Memorial day, just exactly as though it were a common, ordinary day, and observes Washington's birthday by some senator reading out Washington's farewell address, while of the birthdays of McKinley and Lincoln absolutely no record is usually made. The Fourth of July, if congress is in session, and June 14 suffer the same neglect.



NO! WE DON'T HAVE HOLIDAYS SAME AS OTHER PEOPLE

Secretary of War Garrison, however, taking it for granted that Lincoln's birthday would be a holiday the same as in New Jersey and New York, did not go down to his office in the war department at all, so his secretary called up Mr. Garrison's home to inquire where the secretary of war might be. Mrs. Garrison informed Mr. Garrison's secretary that her husband had gone to New York to address a meeting of the Old Colony club. "Mr. Garrison thought that he might just as well take advantage of the holiday today and make this address," added the wife of the secretary of war.

And those who have been a long time in Washington had a great laugh on Secretary Garrison when he returned to the city to be told that February 12 is not a holiday in the District of Columbia. There are a great many other things that Secretary Garrison might learn of the lack of patriotism of congress and in the District of Columbia.

Light Gray Is Most Inconspicuous for Soldiers

WHAT color can be seen the farthest? What is the most conspicuous color? Experiments to answer these questions have been made by the war department to determine the color best suited for a soldier's uniform. The experiment proved few people realize the difference colors can make or their real relation to one another.

The ideal soldier's costume is one that soon fades into the background, and that does not show at all from a distance, making it invisible to the enemy. In order to prove the relative conspicuousness of colors, 12 soldiers were dressed in colored uniforms and ordered to march off, while a group of officers and color experts remained behind to take notes on the uniforms. Two of the 12 soldiers were clad in light gray, two in dark gray, two in green, two in dark blue, two in scarlet, and two in tan, as these are the colors most fitted for uniforms.

The first to disappear were the light gray. The next two were the tan. The next, surprising as it may seem to those who believe they know colors, were the scarlet. Then followed the dark gray, while the dark blue and green remained visible long after the other colors had disappeared.

Experiments were also made at firing at targets of various colors, with the same results. Red and blue targets were also experimented with, and it was proved that blue could be more easily seen at a distance, and hit, than could red.

TOLLS QUESTION IS NEAR FINAL VOTE

BILL SEEMS SURE OF VICTORY IN HOUSE WITH NICE MAJORITY.

CLARK WILL MAKE SPEECH

Speaker Will Close Debate Before Packed Galleries—Senate Will Be Real Snag for Big Question.

Washington, March 31.—The Sims bill, repealing Panama canal tolls exemption for American coastwise ships, will come to a vote in the house within a few hours, and is thought sure to pass. The majority is estimated at from 35 to 75.

Real Snags in Senate.

But while it is conceded that the real fight will come in the senate, where the measure is sure to strike many snags, exciting times are expected during the final debate and roll call on the bill in the lower house. Speaker Clark's speech, which will close the debate for the opponents of the repeal, will have the crowds fighting for seats in the galleries.

The speaker has maintained silence since his defeat on the cloture rule, when only 55 Democratic members of the house followed their recognized leaders, while some 200 of them stood by the administration, but he will break silence on the main issue of the controversy in closing the debate on behalf of opponents of toll exemption repeal.

Speech Is Guarded.

The speech has been guarded with the utmost care. Close friends of the speaker assert that there will be no bitterness, no harking back to political imbroglios, and no reflections on the opinions of others.

They predict that he proposes to discuss the merits of the issue.

On the other hand, some Democrats who have had their ears closely to the ground in the last few days hint that the speaker may surprise his friends and arouse his adversaries.

As to the party strife that has been precipitated, President Wilson has made no comment and so far as known contemplates making none. He made his plea to the congress and awaits results. Close advisers of the president insist that he bears no personal nor political ill will toward the leaders of the party who have differed with him in this crisis; and that any idea, such as has been intimated from many sources in the last few days, that he would attempt to have politically punished the party leaders who oppose him, is farthest from his thoughts.

Senate Discussion.

Meantime, in the senate, discussion will revolve around Senator James Hamilton Lewis' resolution and bill, which are intended as a sort of balm to the wounds of his party members who have thus far opposed the president in his plan for upholding the honor of the nation.

Senator Lewis' measure would give the president authority to suspend tolls whenever he should deem it in the public interest to do so. The Illinois senator will cite a long series of precedents upon which he bases the right of congress to extend such authority to the chief executive without offending any foreign nation or violating any treaty agreement.

As against the proposal of Senator Lewis, the minority leader, Senator Gallinger, will urge a resolution he introduced last week which would express it as the sense of Americans that congress has the right to do as it pleases with respect to American shipping through the Panama canal.

In the senate no cloture can be ordered and it may be weeks before the question is disposed of.

Officer Wrestles With Burglar.

Minneapolis.—A man giving his name as Harry Blenkarn was arrested by Patrolman O'Malley, after a desperate fight on roof of a rooming house. The patrolman, answering a burglar call, found Blenkarn on the roof, tampering with the skylight. Blenkarn drew a knife and there was a struggle. Finally the patrolman knocked the knife out of the man's hand and pushed him toward the stairs. A wrestling match at the head of the stairs resulted in both tumbling down the two flights, O'Malley landed on top.

'Quake Lasts Over Hour.

St. Louis, March 30. — A violent earthquake, lasting one hour and 20 minutes, was recorded on the seismograph of St. Louis university here. It is the belief of officials at the university that the earthquake occurred in the southern part of Mexico or in Central America.

Boilers Delay La Touraine.

New York, March 30.—The steamer La Touraine came into port from Havre more than four days late. Trouble with her boilers had caused the delay. A force of repair men was constantly employed during the voyage to keep enough boilers in condition to supply steam. The vessel's tardiness had caused uneasiness until Captain Caussin reported by wireless that he had encountered heavy seas and was proceeding slowly with slightly deranged machinery.

DUAL LIFE OF WEALTHY MAN

MILLIONAIRE ALLEGED TO HAVE HAD COMMON-LAW WIFE.

Late Iron-Master, Philip Ewald, Apparently Had Mania for Secrecy—Had Adopted Children.

Louisville, Ky., March 28.—Intimate details of the life of Louis Philip Ewald, late iron master of St. Louis and Louisville, which he devoted painstaking efforts and a small fortune to keep secret, were revealed almost five years after his death, during trial of the suit brought by Ellen J. Golden, or Ewald, by which she seeks to establish dower rights in Ewalds estate, alleging she was his common-law wife.

Ewald's estate was estimated to be worth $4,000,000. He willed $15,000 each to nine brothers and sisters, most of whom live in St. Louis, and the remainder to Ellen Golden's three children, whom Ewald adopted. The woman is suing for a judgment for half the property and a widow's interest in the realty, aggregating $2,000,000.

The plaintiff on the witness stand testified that the alleged common-law marriage between herself and Ewald took place in St. Louis in March, 1890. Prior to leaving St. Louis to take her residence in an elaborate home bought for her by Ewald, in an exclusive residence section of this city, she lived in Williamsport, Pa., Pittsburgh, Washington, Chicago and Denver.

More than a hundred telegrams containing expressions of affection, purporting to have been from Ewald and addressed to the plaintiff under the name of "Mrs. E. J. Seaman," at a Detroit hotel, were read to the jury. The plaintiff admitted she was never generally known as Mrs. Ewald.

Testimony at the trial, which began Monday, has disclosed the double life led by the eccentric millionaire iron master, who apparently had a mania for secrecy.

VAUDEVILLE INTERESTS SOLD

Sullivan-Considine Circuit Changes Hands—With Properties for Over $6,000,000.

Kansas City, Mo., March 28.—Marcus Loew of New York city, representing interests of which he is the principal stockholder, signed a contract to purchase the Sullivan-Considine vaudeville circuit and properties for an amount that will exceed $6,000,000. Mr. Loew will take over the properties Aug. 1, next.

The properties, which are scattered throughout the country are owned jointly by John W. Considine and the estate of Timothy D. Sullivan of New York city. Thirty-seven theaters owned outright by the Sullivan-Considine interests, and 100 theaters, which the circuit books and has interests in, were involved in the deal.

Mr. Loew announced he would combine the theaters involved in the deal with the houses he now owns. This will bring the number of theaters now controlled by him up to 200.

BEACHEY TO ENTER CONTEST

Intrepid Aviator and Fowler Decided to Take Part in Round the World Race.

New York, March 27.—Two American aviators, Lincoln Beachy and "Bob" Fowler, have announced their intention of entering the round the world race, to start from the Panama-Pacific exposition grounds in San Francisco next year, it was stated here by Arnold Kruckman, manager of the contest.

Besides these two Americans, the manufacturers of three leading types of aeroplanes in Europe have informed Mr. Kruckman that they will enter aviators and machines.

AMERICAN BOAT GOES DOWN

Relayed Wireless Message Tells of Disaster Which Cost the Lives of Six.

Washington, March 28.—Loss at sea of the American schooner Hattie P. Simpson of Boston with Captain Strong and five members of the crew was reported to the navy department in a relayed wireless message from the steamship Caracas which has on board five survivors of the schooner.

For Suffrage Referendum.

Boston, March 28.—By action of the house the legislature has voted for the first time in its history in favor of referring to the people the granting of suffrage to women. The vote in the house was 168 to 39 on a resolution which had already been favorably acted upon by the senate providing an amendment to the constitution striking the word "male" from the qualifications for voters. The measure must receive favorable action in the legislature next year before it goes before the people.

Polling Begins in Sweden.

Stockholm, March 28.—After one of the most bitter political campaigns in the history of Sweden, polling has been begun for members of the new lower house of the riksdag to replace that dissolved on March 5 as the result of the alleged invasion of the rights of the people by King Gustaf V. The stockholm district is the first to vote and the polling will continue elsewhere throughout the kingdom until April 7. Owing to the intense interest 90 per cent of the vote is expected to be brought out.

SENSATIONAL TRAGEDY IN PARIS

The murder of Gaston Calmette (right), editor of Figaro, by Mme. Henriette Caillaux, wife of Joseph Caillaux (left), French minister of finance, has aroused Paris as it has not been aroused in years. Crowds paraded the streets crying "Down with the assassin!" The tragedy was the outcome of a bitter campaign which the editor had been waging against the minister.

ASQUITH WORKING TO SETTLE TANGLE

BRITISH PREMIER STRUGGLING HARD TO AVERT CRISIS.

RESIGNATIONS STILL TROUBLE

Strong Pressure Fails to Make Army Men Reconsider Stand—Much Depends on the Action of General Gough.

London, March 30.—Still facing the crisis which may result in disruption of the cabinet, the early calling of a general election or wholesale resignation in the army, Premier Asquith is busy with the struggle to straighten out the tangled affairs growing out of the movement against Ulster.

Resignations Not Withdrawn.

Field Marshal Sir John French and General John Spencer Ewart have re-despite tremendous pressure and much now depends on the action of General Gough, who is said to have been summoned to London from the Gurragh. General Gough, it is reported, has been asked to surrender the written guarantee signed by War Secretary Seely, French and Ewart, that his troops will not be forced to fight Ulster.

If Gough complies with this request, General French and General Ewart, it is said, will withdraw their resignations. If he refuses, then the commanding general will remain firm in their determination to retire.

Steps to Secure Document.

It will be pointed out to General Gough that the "treaty" is now void, having been repudiated by the government, and should he refuse to acknowledge its cancellation he might be ordered to surrender the document or be dismissed. Such action as this on the part of the government would certainly be followed, however, by wholesale resignations from the service, it is declared, and the calling of an early election would be certain.

Premier Asquith's determination to retain War Minister Seely in the cabinet is believed to have brought about the complications in the situation.

Gen. Paget Not Entangled.

General Paget, commanding the troops in Ireland, has so far avoided becoming entangled, but should General Gough be dismissed and other officers resign it is believed he might come into the open, possibly with a resignation and the announcement of his dealing with Colonel Seely. General Paget's treating with officers as to their willingness to serve in Ulster is plainly rebuked in the new orders issued by the war council, though the entire affair which started the trouble is declared to have been due to a "misunderstanding of orders."

Earth's Core Not Molten.

Chicago, March 30. — Ancient and popular beliefs that the core of the earth is a molten mass have been investigated by scientists of the University of Chicago, who announce to the world that the planet is more rigid than steel, that it could not explode or be destroyed by a fire within itself. The results of their experiments will be published in the Astrophysical Journal and the Journal of Geology. The experiments were designed by Professor Albert A. Michelson.

Municipal Store Called Failure.

Chicago, March 28.—Chicago's municipal store, where the needy were to purchase supplies at cost, has done a daily average business of $9.11 since it opened, on Feb 19, according to a statement by the City Comptroller's office. Advocates of the enterprise admit it has failed to fill any long-felt want. The store does not make deliveries and a rigid investigation is made of each prospective customer. These are the reasons advanced for the lack of patronage.

JUROR AND FAMILY HUNGRY

STARVING WHILE TRIAL OF A CASE GOES ON.

Man Finally Totters Into Court, Confessing He and Family Have Not Eaten.

New York, March 30.—Just before the opening of the Hudson county court in Jersey City Leopold Wauters, a juror, tottered in and asked a court officer that he be relieved from service on the jury. As tears ran down his cheeks, Wauters said:

"I am suffering from hunger. I cannot pay attention to what is going on. There was only a little bread in the house this morning, and I left it for the children."

Judge Campbell was informed and court was delayed while Wauters enjoyed his first meal in days. The $12 due for jury services was advanced and a constable was sent with it to the home of Wauters. He found the entire family huddled in one cold room. The constable bought some food and fuel and gave the rest of the money to Mrs. Wauters. The juror resumed his place in the box.

Wauters was one of the panel of petit jurors drawn for the term and gladly welcomed his apparent good fortune, for it meant $2 a day when the courts are in session, and he was out of work and without money and had a wife and family of five children to support. He was drawn as one of the jurors who are trying an action on contract that had been going on since last Monday.

NEED VOTE FOR PROTECTION

Politics Is Woman's Only Weapon to Safeguard Her Home and Family Says Kate O'Hare.

St. Louis, March 30.—Politics is the only instrument with which a woman can protect her home, according to Mrs. Kate O'Hare, Socialist and suffragist, who was the chief speaker at the largest of six meetings held simultaneously in the libraries of the city by the Equal Suffrage league.

In writing politics for a Kansas City newspaper and working for the uplift of the factory women of New York, Mrs. O'Hare said she had seen enough of politics "to sicken her for a life-time" were it not for her realization of its usefulness as a woman's weapon.

"If St. Louis women had the power," she said, "they would stop paying 20 cents per capita for health and 30 cents per capita for police protection, and would reverse the rates of these tax assessments.

"Women are held responsible for the food they put on their tables, for the clothes their families wear, and for the condition of sanitation in their home, yet women have no power to control the production of food, the manufacture of clothing, nor have they anything to say about plumbing and building rules."

Shoplifters Are Sentenced

Kansas City, Mo., March 30.—Margaret Duke, 20 years old, and Mrs. Violet Geffene, 27 years old, pleaded guilty to shoplifting following a raid on Mrs. Geffene's apartments, where the police found hats, gowns and lingerie valued at $4,000, that had been stolen from Kansas City department stores. Miss Duke was sentenced to three and one-half years in the penitentiary, while Mrs. Geffene received a sentence of four years.

N. J. Election Officers Guilty.

Jersey City, N. J., March 28.—Convicted of the charge of having made false election returns while serving on the Hoboken election boards in the primary election of September, 1913, 13 election officers, eight Democrats and five Republicans, were sentenced Common Pleas Judge Mark A. Sullivan and George J. Tennant to serve not less than 18 months nor more than three years in state prison. The cases against two others were dismissed because of accidental errors.

VILLA SHOT; 3,000 DEAD AT TORREON

SOLDIER FROM FRONT TELLS OF WOUNDING OF REBEL GENERAL.

CITY IS ALMOST CAPTURED

Three Barracks Remain to Be Taken By Constitutionalist Forces—Story of Deadly Fight.

Chihuahua, March 31.—General Francisco Villa has been wounded in the fighting at Torreon, according to a report received from the front. The news was brought by a soldier, one of the wounded sent here for treatment.

Rebels Near Victory.

Two thousand federals and nearly as many rebels have fallen in the desperate encounters of the last six days, according to an official message from the front. The main barracks and two smaller cuartels alone hold out against the rebels, according to the dispatches.

Since Saturday night Villa has taken Cerro de la Cruz and the Torreon foundry, the reports assert, and he is now flinging the entire strength of his force against the three points which still hold out. General Thomas Urbina is among the Rebels wounded.

Deadliest Fight Yet.

The fighting of the last six days has been as deadly as anything on record since Madero first raised the standard of revolt against Porfirio Diaz. The report of rebel losses (900 dead and wounded) is thought to have been minimized; 588 wounded have already been brought here from the front, while several hundred others have been sent to Jiminez, Parrel and Santa Rosalia.

The report that General Villa had been wounded is not confirmed in the official dispatches, but the soldier who brought the news says that he himself saw the Rebel chieftain struck by a bullet and forced to retire from the front.

Villa's Condition Withheld.

The fact was withheld from the rank of the Rebel army for moral effect, the soldier said.

A German military observer, who arrived from the front, said:

"The Federal army lured us right into Gomez Palacio, a suburb to the north of Torreon, before they opened fire. Then they let lose such a hail of rifle and machine gun shots as would have completely demoralized an ordinary Mexican army. The men fell by the score.

"One cotton bale platform by the railroad tracks was so covered with dead rebels that a person could not walk across it without stepping on a body. General Villa had such a large army that he felt he could afford to sacrifice many men to get a foothold. Almost the whole Zaragoza brigade under General Aguirre Benavides was thus wiped out, although I think General Benavides escaped.

Shock of Surprise.

"The shock and surprise to the Rebel troops, who had expected to scare the Federals and walk into Torreon with little fighting, resulted in a temporary withdrawal. Three or four days of fighting up to the time I left failed to bring about any results."

General Villa's delay in taking Torreon has revived the belief, that should the Huerta forces drive him north something in the nature of a northern republic, embracing the states bordering on the United States, will be established.

Unless decisive results are achieved soon the financial affairs of the Rebel territory will reach a crisis, according to men in authority. Six million pesos in fiat money are in circulation in the states of Chihuahua, Durango and part of Zarcatecas, and this money is steadily decreasing in purchasing power, with no prospective reserve backing, while more money is being issued.

15,000 to 13,000 Men Defend Torreon.

Mexico City.—President Huerta is showing concern over the situation at Torreon, but General Velasco has sent only the most meagre reports of the operations.

The attitude of the Mexican public here is wholly apathetic. The usual crowds are attending the theaters and other places of amusements.

The government asserts that General Valasco hand under his command from 12,000 to 15,000 men, and, with the reinforcements under General Javier Moure and minor forces reported en route, there should be facing Villa before he can claim Torreon, from 15,000 to 18,000 Federals.

Fortune Awaits Young Man.

Xane, Penn., March 31.—A fortune of $365,000 awaits Keith Dalrymple, aged 23, of Port Alle, who disappeared from home seven years ago.

Carranza Arrives at Juarez.

Juarez, Mex., March 31.—General Venustiano Carranza, first chief of the revolution, was welcomed to Juarez Sunday. In the last few weeks the general has ridden horseback for 500 miles, and in the last two months he has traveled 2,000 miles in the same way. Carranza said that he had no occasion to modify his decree of several months ago, wherein he stated that no act or contract of the Huerta government would be recognized should the revolution succeed in capturing Mexico City.

PROPER WAY TO PLOW

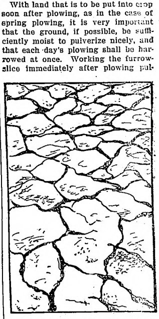
STRAIGHT, WELL-TURNED FURROW IS SOUGHT BY FARMER.

Very Important That Soil Be Sufficiently Moist to Pulverize Nicely—Plowed Land Readily Absorbs Rainfall.

(By R. G. WEATHERSTONE.)

The pride of every good plowman is a straight, well-turned furrow; and yet its straightness is but a small part of its merit. Its true merit is measured by its depth, the manner in which it is turned and the way in which it lies. When properly turned, it will present a loosely pulverized and completely inverted furrow-slice that leaves behind a furrow of sufficient depth, even in the bottom, and clean cut in every part.

With land that is to be put into crop soon after plowing, as in the case of spring plowing, it is very important that the ground, if possible, be sufficiently moist to pulverize nicely, and that each day's plowing shall be harrowed at once. Working the furrow-slice immediately after plowing pulverizes it more completely and checks the loss of moisture by evaporation. With the fall plowing of land that is not going to be put into crop until the following spring, it is not so important that the furrow-slice pulverize as completely, for lumps and clods that are turned up will crumble and pulverize by the action of rain, air, sunshine and frost.



A Badly Cracked Condition of the Surface Soil Which Allows an Excessive Loss of Moisture by Evaporation. Right Cultivation at the Proper Time Would Have Prevented This.

Plowed land readily absorbs rainfall, and the loosely-turned furrows increase the storage capacity of the soil.

Plowing is also the principal method by which grain stubble and other forms of organic matter are introduced into the soil. Hence it is important that the plow be properly equipped, and the furrow-slice so turned that all organic matter will be completely turned under, at such a depth that the harrow and the cultivator will scarcely be troubled with it afterward.

HINTS FOR POTATO GROWERS

Determining Factor in Production of Maximum Crop of Tubers Is Purity of Seed Stock.

Good seed is a determining factor in the production of maximum crops of potatoes.

All tubers showing discoloration of the flesh should be rejected.

Purity of seed stock is an essential quality of good seed. Serious losses are sustained by the grower through mixtures.

A more liberal use of seed will generally result in both increased production and profit.

The use of high-grade seed would increase the returns from the potato crop of the country by many millions of dollars.

A good storage-place is essential in order to insure sound, firm seed at planting time.

KEROSENE IS CHEAP REMEDY

Not Only Good Lice Killer But Often Small Dose of Oil Will Cure Cholera in Chicks.

(By J. M. MARTIN.)

If kerosene were not so common and cheap we would consider it a great poultry remedy.

I have cured my hens by the use of a small spring-bottom oil can, with which I injected a little oil into their nests.

If their heads are swelled anoint the swollen part with common vaseline. Continue this treatment about four days.

Kerosene is a good lice killer; so is hot salt brine.

Often a teaspoonful of kerosene will cure the cholera in chicks.

Bury Worthless Eggs.

As you remove the worthless eggs from the incubator when a hatch is finished, keep them in a tight box until you can bury them. Do not tempt cats and crows by throwing them out.

Care of Hen House.

Spray a light solution of carbolic acid over the walls of the hen house now and then. If one can find time to whitewash the walls, so much the better.

MINNESOTA STATE NEWS

FOREST CROPS ARE HELD ESSENTIAL

MOVEMENT TO SET ASIDE NON-AGRICULTURAL LANDS FOR GROWING TREES.

GREAT SOURCE OF REVENUE

Minnesota Forestry Association Speakers Discuss Vast Possibilities of Plan and Assert State Is Losing Millions of Dollars

St. Paul.—A movement to set aside non-agricultural state lands for forestry purposes was started at the annual meeting of the Minnesota State Forestry association held here. A campaign for the passage of the constitutional forestry amendment which will make this possible was started. The executive secretary of the association was empowered to devote his time to the furtherance of this campaign.

The state association elected the following officers at the close of its two-day session: President, Dietrich Lange, St. Paul; vice president, E. A. Cheyney; treasurer, Phil Hanson; secretary, E. O. Buhler.

Entire Situation Discussed.

The entire situation with regard to the non-agricultural lands in Minnesota was discussed. It was pointed out that the state could make no better move than to raise trees on such lands.

The development of Minnesota's summer resort regions and the protection of the game and fish—these two topics also occupied the time of the association.

The speakers included Clyde Leavitt, forester, Canadian commission on conservation; W. T. Cox, state forester; E. G. Cheyney, director of the college of forestry at the university; J. E. Rhodes, secretary of the National Lumberman's association; Dean Woods, of the College of Agriculture; Mrs. C. L. Atwood, president Minnesota federation of women's clubs; D. Lange, superintendent of schools, St. Paul; Charles E. Johnson, of the university; J. Peters, of the department of forestry, Washington, D. C., and others.

Resolutions Adopted.

The resolutions favored soil classification; management by the state of state owned forest lands; acquirement of additional lands suitable for forest crops; the reversion to the state of lands, non-agricultural, on which taxes have not been paid; the constitutional amendment for revolving fund of $250,000 for construction of roads on state lands; establishment of factories for production of finished products from the raw materials; classification of forest lands and taxation accordingly.

"Minnesota and most of the other states have something to learn from Canada," said Clyde Leavitt, forester of the Canadian commission of conservation, in his address. "Canada has recognized the fact that forestry is essentially a government rather than a private concern, and has, with only minor exceptions, retained in government ownership the non-agricultural lands of the country."

Boosts Fishing Industry.

D. Lange, in speaking on "The Lure of the Woods," discussed at length the necessity of developing the fishing industry in Minnesota.

"I believe the time has come," he said, "when a careful study should be made of the fishery resources in Minnesota in international as well as in state waters. I believe that with scientific management the production of one of the most wholesome food supplies could easily be increased ten to one hundred fold in this state."

Mr. Lange also dwelt on the possibilities of attracting tourists to Minnesota. He said that the north woods ought to be the mecca for thousands of summer vacationists from the Mississippi valley.

Mrs. C. L. Atwood discussed the part the women of the state ought to play in the setting aside of state forests, the protection of the wild life, etc. She made a particular plea for the conservation of bird life.

E. G. Cheyney, of the college of forestry at the university, presented figures to show that the school funds from the state would gain millions of dollars annually by devoting non-agricultural lands to forestry purposes. He urged active work on the part of everyone interested in forestry in behalf of the forestry amendment to come before the people next fall. State Forester W. T. Cox, J. E. Rhodes and many others spoke along the lines of the state forests idea.

Use Suitable Land.

"It is a crime to send poor deluded settlers out onto land that is fit for nothing but the raising of trees, totally unfit for agriculture," said J. E. Rhodes. "Where the land is best suited for agriculture, and there are millions of acres of such lands, there we should direct the settlers who come to Minnesota. But to send them to the non-agricultural spots does more harm than good. The abandoned farms in some parts of Minnesota are a glaring warning."

CLAY COUNTY LAND MEETING

Organize in Order to Aid Red River Development Association—Plans Laid.

Moorhead.—Land men of this city have held the first meeting for a permanent organization of all real estate dealers in Clay county for the purpose of backing up the recently formed Minnesota Red River Valley Development association and particularly to assist Leslie Welter, the president of the association, in perfecting arrangements needed for the entertainment of the association at the time of the annual meeting in June. It is the ambition to make the meeting the peer of any ever held in the valley.

The land men appointed a committee on by-laws and plan of organization, the committee to report at an adjourned meeting to be held on Friday. In the meantime the temporary secretary, C. A. Draeger, will send letters to all land men in the county urging them to attend the meeting and help to perfect a permanent organization.

It is the plan to co-operate with a similar organization at Crookston and with those to be formed in each of the counties affiliated with the development association.

EBERHART OUT "ON RECORD"

Governor Announces He Will Be Candidate for the Republican Nomination for Re-election.

St. Paul. — Governor Adolph O. Eberhart has announced his candidacy for renomination on the Republican ticket at the primaries June 16 and appointed George F. Authier, his secretary, as chairman of his personal campaign committee. No political headquarters will be established.

In his announcement, the governor outlines his record, says it is up to the people to determine whether they will indorse "a campaign of constructive policy" and not one "bounded by personal abuse, slander and villification of the state itself" and adds:

"This constitutes the challenge submitted by the opposition, which I now accept."

Governor Eberhart's platform is brief.

"I shall seek," he says, "an indorsement upon the record of my administration, during which Minnesota has won recognition by all other states as leading all lines of true progress and achievement."

Patient Returned to Asylum.

Winona.—Charles Lowry, who has in time past terrorized the villages of Dakota and Dresbach and other places down river, and who was arrested on Saturday in Winona for an alleged burglary committed last August at the E. L. King summer home below Homer, has been taken back to the insane asylum at Whitehall, Wis., where he escaped a few days before his visit to the King home last summer. He was subsequently arrested in northern Minnesota and was then started for the Whitehall asylum, but gave the officers in charge the slip by jumping through the window of a car on which he was traveling.

Refused to Marry; $15,000 Asked

Minneapolis.—Suit for $15,000 for alleged breach of promise to marry has been filed in district court by Mrs. Mary Paulson, 47 years old, a widow, against John Hegland, 68 years old, a widower and retired farmer, who she asserts has property valued at $25,000. In her complaint she avers that the promise of marriage was made to her last August, and that she accepted after Mr. Hegland bought the wedding ring. She declares he attempted to repudiate the engagement later and for this she demands $15,000.

Sick Son Saves Parents.

Minneapolis.—Their stairway exit blocked by flames, believed to have been of incendiary origin, Addington C. Hardin and invalid wife escaped through the second story of their home only when their 18-year-old son, Harold, who also was ill, climbed hand over hand down a rope of blankets and set a ladder. Several hours after the fire apparenty had been extinguished and while the family was staying with neighbors, a second blaze was discovered in a front upstairs room.

Educator Goes to Farm.

Minneapolis.—Willis Mason West, author of "The Ancient History of Charlemagne"; "Modern History," "The Ancient World" and "The History of the University of Minnesota," and whose name appears in the select catalog of notables, "Who's Who," has renounced the classroom where he has held forth for nearly two score years and become a tiller of the soil about Lake Pokegama near Grand Rapids.

General R. N. Adams Dies.

Minneapolis. — Brigadier - General R. N. Adams, for the past thirty-five years in charge of home missionary work of the Northwest for the Presbyterian church, is dead of apoplexy at his home in Merriam Park. General Adams was born in Greenfield, Ohio, 78 years ago. He received his education at Miami university. A member of the graduating class when the Civil war broke out, he left the university and, as commander of the college company, led his classmates in battle. He was soon promoted.

IMMIGRATION TO NORTH IS HEAVY

SETTLERS FLOCKING INTO RED RIVER VALLEY COUNTIES BY SCORES.

CLASS OF NEWCOMERS GOOD

Significant That Farmers Coming to State Are Type That Will Improve Agricultural Conditions—Alfalfa Acreage Grows.

Crookston.—To date more cars of immigrants have arrived than were recorded up to June 1 for 1913. The immigrants have not all been for Polk county by any means, but have scattered through Kittson, Roseau, Marshall, Red Lake and Pennington counties. Ada, in Norman county, reports the heaviest immigration experienced in ten years, and Mahnomen, Clay and Becker counties are not being overlooked.

Class of Immigrants.

But it is the class of newcomers, even more than the number, that is significant. Morford, a farmer from Alexis, Ill., arrived recently with twenty-five shorthorns, eighteen brood pigs and a fine bunch of brood mares for the Rolsch farm, which he purchased last year. He is not an exception to the quality, but the rule.

Among the first inquiries of the newcomers is for good seed corn that is acclimated. Fortunately the corn raisers here last year anticipated the demand, and there is a large amount of good seed available.

As an indication of conditions financially, at an annual stock sale at McIntosh last week, out of a total of $5,000 worth of stock sold, all was for spot cash except $171. At a stock sale here Tuesday, grade cows sold for from $85 to $100, and spring calves brought $25 to $45. Everything was sold for cash. Grade and thoroughbred stock has been shipped in from Iowa and Illinois this spring, showing a long step forward in increasing and conserving the stock in the valley.

Alfalfa Acreage Increased.

G. J. Johnson, the Donaldson, Kittson county, banker, reports that the acreage of alfalfa on the Walter Hill farm is to be increased this spring by 1,000 acres. The farm already has several hundred acres which have produced big crops for several years.

Over 100 farmers about Donaldson are seeding from two to 100 acres of alfalfa, and the corn acreage will be greatly increased, more than doubled, says Mr. Johnson. A. E. Pfiffner, the Argyle banker, says the same is true of Marshall county. It is believed the corn acreage will be doubled throughout this entire territory, while the alfalfa acreage will be increased more than ten-fold.

Another encouraging sign is the diligence farmers generally are showing in securing the best seed grain. This is shown by the wholesale inquiries received by A. D. Van Sickle, the Marshall county world's champion oat raiser, who has won scores of prizes at farm crops shows and fairs. Hundreds of farmers have had their seed grain tested at the northwest experiment station here, and practically all are having their grain tested somewhere or testing it themselves. This shows an advanced step, the result of crop shows, fairs, school agricultural work and the general progressive tendency.

TEMPERANCE MEN ORGANIZE

Plan Campaign for Goodhue County to Promote State Prohibitory Statute.

Red Wing.—Temperance men of the county met here to take council for a united campaign for the election of legislators committed to the enactment of a state-wide prohibitory statute, and the submission of an amendment to the constitution to make the measure irrevocable except by the voice of the people. There was not a discordant syllable and the harmony was enthusiastic.

Professor O. O. Stageberg was made permanent chairman. A get-together committee was elected, representing all organizations, and all parts of the county, and presented resolutions committing the gathering to a vigorous fight for candidates for legislature who are for the measure and a law enforcement county ticket.

Local questions and candidates were discussed, and the session adjourned until evening, when a public rally was held.

Laymen Discuss Missions.

Rochester.—A two-day laymen's missionary program was brought to a close here with a banquet, at which 100 men were present. E. W. Peck, state secretary of the Y. M. C. A., and Rev. J. W. Nixon were the speakers. State Secretary Peck addressed a union meeting Sunday night on the recent around the world tour in the interests of the Men and Religion Forward Movement. A service was held for the women's missionary societies of the city.

PREPARING FOR CLOVER CROP

Often a Good Plan to Break Ground the Preceding Spring and Grow Fertilizing Crop.

If the aim is to get clover and grass on a thin soil it is often a good plan to break the ground the preceding spring and to grow a fertilizing crop during the summer that can be cultivated and then disked into the surface soil. When cowpeas can be grown they are excellent for the purpose.

On very thin land I have gotten the finest clover sod in this way, says a writer in an exchange. Expensive way? someone asks. Well, any way of covering thin soil with a heavy clover sod is not inexpensive. I like the plan. The tillage kills weed seeds and frees fertility. The vines are chopped in the surface before they become tough. The humus is just where it is needed, and the soil is firm.

If one prefers, rape may be sown the 1st of September, and then the land fitted for clover in the spring without the plow. Leave the vegetable matter at the surface. Or timothy may be sown in the fall and clover added in the spring. Or wheat may be seeded and clover in the spring.

KEEP THE MACHINERY OILED

Usefulness of Implements Is Greatly Increased and Amount of Labor Greatly Reduced.

One of the little things that is lacking on a majority of farm implements is a good and convenient system of lubrication. The common oil cup with open top or loose cap is sure to get filled with dirt and grit, which cut out the bearings, largely increasing the power required to operate the machine and greatly reducing its period of usefulness.

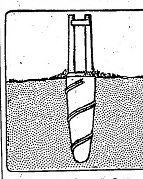
The hard oil cup, which holds enough oil to last a week or more, always is tight, and can be screwed down a little each day, thus insuring a clean bearing and a regular supply of grease. Many of the common implements could be vastly improved by replacing the common oil holes with hard oil cups.

The oil holes can easily be reamed out and threaded to the proper standard and the hard oil cups screwed into them. The amount of work and expense required will be returned many fold in the saving of horseflesh and the increased life of the machinery.

THREAD FOR CONCRETE POST

Idea Discovered Several Years Ago in Securing Telephone Poles Now Being Put to Use.

The latest way of setting concrete fence posts is to put screw threads on the lower ends of the posts and twist them into the ground just as a screw is driven into a board. Some one found several years ago if the lower end of a telephone post was pointed and a rope was coiled about it like a screw thread, the post could be screwed into soft earth easily. The same idea is now being used in a reinforced concrete fence post which was recently patented. When the post is molded, the lower end is tapered slightly and a spiral thread of concrete is formed as an integral part of the base. Greater lightness is secured in the post by molding the upper part in the form of three slender reinforced rods of concrete tied together with solid rings at intervals. This construction makes possible the use of a heavy club stuck through between the concrete rods to furnish a leverage for screwing the post into the ground.—Chicago Tribune.



Threaded Concrete Post.

Best Soil for Alfalfa.

Alfalfa seems to do best on sandy loam soils that have a good supply of plant food and are well drained, though it has been known to have grown in a heavy clay soil. It will do well on any soil that will produce wheat or corn. The field designed for alfalfa should be selected with the view of leaving it for several years. The plant seems to reach its prime in four years and can, as a rule, be left in a field profitably for seven or eight years. No difficulty is experienced in getting alfalfa out of a field, if it is so desired, if a field of it is plowed in midsummer and kept well cultivated.

Free Range for Turkeys.

Turkeys must have free range in order to do well. Do not keep them closely confined. If you have fed them regularly they will continue to come up at that time for their feed even if allowed to run free.

Low Vitality of Hogs.

Coarseness in hogs indicates low vitality, sluggishness and slow feeding qualities.

LESSON OF HIS LIFE

By GEORGE ELMER COBB.

"Get out!"

"I'll be glad to do it."

"And—stay out!"

"I've been waiting for the chance for a month. You are a hard, mean taskmaster, Mr. Green, and you'll never get another boy to stick by you as I have. I've only one regret—it's her!" and Ned Calvert turned toward a pale-faced, agitated girl near by, who stood trembling all over in fear and distress.

Ned had called himself "a boy." He was not quite that in his stalwart appearance, although he was under twenty and Nettie Green was not eighteen. There was boy and girl love between them, however. She had been to him a guiding star. Now it must all end, and he was reckless and defiant with the man in whose employ he had been for over a year.

His bold, independent outbreak fairly electrified his master. Silas Green held a heavy whip in his hand. He swung it and himself around facing Ned, his eyes blazing.

"You miserable poorhouse brat!" he fairly shrieked. "Her! her! the niece I've raised and housed going gallivanting to a circus without my permission with you. Why, I'll crush you! and as to her—"

Zing—snap!—the cruel lash snipped the air like a writhing serpent and enwrapt the shrinking, terrorized girl with brutal force.

"You coward!" shouted Ned Calvert, then he had thrown himself upon the wretched tyrant. He was no match for him, but in his mad fury he bore Green to the ground.

"Why, I'll flay you!" roared the irate farmer. "Take that!"

Prostrate as he was he managed to reverse the whip. It had a bulky whalebone-weighted handle. This landed on the wrist of Ned. The latter uttered a sharp cry of pain. His arm fell nerveless to his side.

"I'll go," said Ned, his face writhing with the agony of the blow, "but I'll remember you! Nettie, don't forget me. I want you. I'll be back here to take you away from the man you ought to be ashamed to call an uncle just as soon as I make a fortune—and I know how to make one," declared Ned with grim emphasis.

The Package Contained a Heavy Horsewhip.

Nettie cried her heart out all that night. Green did not speak to her for several days following. He was ashamed of what he had done. At the end of a week he told Nettie so. Then later he mourned that he had ever lost his temper and through it the services of the best helper he had ever hired.

It was when his five acre plat of strawberries ripened that he sorely missed the boy who had been so famously handy during the previous season. Ned was popular with all the juveniles of Brampton. Everything depended on picking the berries at just the right time. Paying one cent a quart, Ned had employed an army of vacation school children. Not a berry rotted, not a delivery was missed and nearly one thousand dollars net profit came from the well-managed enterprise.

The present season, however, old Silas Green found that he could not hire pickers. The children had heard of his cruel treatment of their favorite. Again, the bright encouraging jollity of Ned that made work play to them was an absent element.

There came rain and then a hot sun. There was a consequent magical ripening of the berries. The few pickers whom Green could induce to work for him could not handle a third of the task. Hundreds of quarts of the fruit rotted. At the end of the season the troubled farmer found himself two hundred dollars to the bad.

One year to the day from the one when Silas Green had turned a faithful but independent helper from his door, there came a registered package to the farm house. Curious and eager the farmer opened it.

The package contained—a heavy horsewhip!

It was a counterpart of the one with which he had struck his niece and Ned Calvert, and the old fellow winced at the telling reminder.

Two years to the same day a second package arrived—again a heavy horsewhip.

Poor Nettie had grown thin and pale and wretched at the loss of playmate and lover. Her heart saddened at this token of the absent one. She noticed the tears come to the eyes of her uncle.

"Nothing but ill luck since I drove the lad away!" he groaned. "He bears me no good thought, as his 'presents' show. I can't blame him, but I was in the wrong, I confess it. I'm sorry for it."

"Don't worry, uncle," spoke gentle-hearted Nettie. "Maybe Ned will come back some day."

But her words failed to lighten the burden of the broken old man. Silas Green told the truth when he spoke of his growing bad fortune. He tried new help, but they failed in their duty. A season of bad crops all around forced him to mortgage the little place.

"I see nothing but ruin before me!" he lamented.

One night there came a knock at the door of the humble farm house. Nettie went to the door, viewed the visitor and fell back with a vague, startled cry. Silas Green arose to his feet, his jaws dropped, starting spellbound.

It was Ned, but a new Ned, who, uninvited, advanced into the room. His eyes were bright and brave, his lips smiling. He was erect, handsome, well-dressed. He extended his hand to the old farmer as though there had never been anything between them. Then he turned to the trembling, agitated Nettie, with the words:

"I've come back to you as I said I would. Am I welcome?"

"Oh, Ned!" gasped the overcome girl and fluttered into his arms.

"Boy," spoke Silas Green huskily, "you have forgiven me?"

"For what?" cried Ned. "That whip blow? Mr. Green, you were in the wrong and I shall always think so—"

"Yes! yes; I admit it—"

"But that blow made a man of me. Shall I tell you how? I was mad all through when I left you and fancied I had lost Nettie for good. Three hangers on at the circus that day had shown me how I could make a lot of money. I was reckless and discouraged. I knew they were up to no good, but, homeless, friendless, I didn't care. When I went to join them they refused to take me into their plots on account of my helpless wrist. That saved me, for their scheme was to rob a bank. They did it, but one was shot dead in a melee with the police and the two others were sent to the state penitentiary."

"Oh, Ned!" shivered Nettie, clinging the closer to him.

"That was the lesson of my life," pursued the returned wanderer. "I swore never to graze the path of wrong again. I went west, poor—thinking of Nettie. I have come back east rich—still thinking of Nettie. Uncle Green, can I have her for my wife?"

And in the willing broken assent of the contrite old man, all the past was forgotten and the reunited trio saw only a bright, golden future.

OPENING TRADE WITH CHINA

Spread of Western Ideas Means the Development of New and Profitable Market.

Many Chinese women are adopting Caucasian clothing, modified to suit Chinese taste. "This change, though limited to a comparatively small number, is having a marked effect upon trade," writes Consul-General George E. Anderson of Hongkong. "Hongkong shop windows—the more fashionable shops that cater to Chinese trade—are full of modifications of foreign dress for the use of Chinese women, and manikins displaying styles are of a distinctly foreign cast. Formerly warmth in winter in China was obtained by a series of garments of various qualities and weights—the number of undergarments, all similar to the outer garment, being proportioned to the temperature. The introduction of knit underwear, however, has made these several layers of clothing unnecessary and the change has resulted in a difference in the cut of outer garments. The coat, formerly reaching just below the hips, has been lengthened into what is practically a skirt, almost covering the trousers. In the cut of these skirts, or long coats, fashionable Chinese women now generally affect foreign styles.

"Use of foreign underclothing and of fewer layers of Chinese garments has so modified the wraps of Chinese women. Many Chinese women for some time have affected foreign style furs, the Chinese being very fond of furs and using them generally in native dress. Formerly a Chinese woman completed her costume in winter by a fur lined garment, sometimes more than one, or by garments quilted with cotton or waste silk filling. These garments are now little used.

"A gold or silver cigarette case or a vanity bag is often carried. Other articles that in the past two years have shown a large increase in imports include handkerchiefs, hose supporters and elastics, machine embroideries, combs, fan chains, necklaces and pendants, rings and bracelets, wrist watches and brooches, and fancy hosiery. Increased consumption of goods now coming into use may be expected as the influence of western fashions is felt in interior cities of the new republic."

Law Has Helped British Poor.

Out of 25,500 physicians in Great Britain 20,000 are now enrolled under the medical benefit provision of Lloyd-George's national insurance act. Last year they divided among them nearly $23,000,000 from the government. Each doctor averaged an addition of $1,150 to his income. Much of the opposition from the medical profession has disappeared, and thousands of poor people who formerly went without medical care have been helped.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879

J. A. Duffy of this city has filed as a candidate for the nomination for representative from this legislative district and will make his formal announcement next week. It will be the Gazette's pleasure to support Mr. Duffy in his campaign and more will be said in that connection when his formal announcement appears.—Red Lake Falls Gazette.

We note that a large number of our Republican exchanges are roasting that elimination convention to a stand still. It now looks as if Lee would not come any nearer defeating Eberhart than he did two years ago, and if Eberhart is eliminated at all it will be by a Democrat in November. So far as the editor of this paper is concerned he would not give a row of pins which one of these two men gets the nomination, as we feel as if we had been eliminated for the present at least. As a member of the third house in 1893 we had a pretty good opportunity to see some of the work done by Mr. Lee as speaker of the house that winter, that would not make a county optionist swear by him.

W. L. Douglas elected himself governor of Massachussetts by presistently advertising his shoes. Lots of people who are candidates for office don't think it pays to advertise, in fact some of them boldly assert that the money they pay for advertising space is thrown away as "boodle." There is only one candidate for any county office in this county who has kept her name continually before the public in all the papers published in the county, and if that advertising does not count up the votes at the Primary election, then the newspaper boys had better come out and promptly acknowledge that it does not pay to advertise. There is only one case on record where the eleventh hour servant received the same price as the fellow who worked all day, and that is in the Bible, but it won't do for a candidate for public office to depend upon working fast and furious enough at the eleventh hour to get the same attention as the one who went out early and worked steadily the entire day.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Realizing thet the people in the Sixty Fifth Dist. are dependent upon the Agricultural products of the soil, and her wealth must come there from, I shall favor all legislation that will tend to benefit rural communities especially the farmers and laborers.

I am opposed to "Boss" rule, Bossrulers, are political "Yeggmen," robbing the voters our of their inherent rights of a free ballot debarring them from a free choice of their Legislators;—therefore, I favor our present Non-Partisan Primary Law and will support all legislation that will tend to make our primary law more efficient. I am opposed to the centralization of the power of Government but firmly believe in the rule of the people in governing all their local and domestic affairs.

Signed, G. P. JONES,
Bagley, Minn.

The farmers who are expecting to stay and make their future home on their farms can not better invest a few dollars than to buy a small stock of fruit trees, and small fruit shrubbery such as currants, gooseberries and raspberries, as it will only be a few years before they will get rich returns from the amount of their investment.

Steinitz Was Defiant.

A story is told of an altercation between Wilhelm Steinitz and Gustave Epstein. The latter was one of the most influential and richest bankers in Vienna and was very fond of a game of chess. When Steinitz was a young man he used to play frequently at the Vienna Chess club and on one occasion engaged the famous banker. The game became very complicated, and Steinitz studied the board longer than usual. His opponent grew impatient and at last drawled out sarcastically, "Well?" Steinitz silently continued the game, and after a time it went in his favor. The banker then began to think deeply, taking considerable time before moving a piece. Steinitz could not resist the temptation to utter a long drawn out. "Well?" "Sir, don't forget who you are and who I am!" roared Epstein angrily. Steinitz immediately retorted. "On the bourse you are Epstein and I am Steinitz; over the board I am Epstein and you are Steinitz!"

CHAPTER I.

March Comes In Like the Lion.

The train, which had roared through a withering gale of sleet all the way up from New York, came to a standstill, with many an ear-splitting sigh, alongside the little station, and a reluctant porter opened his vestibule door to descend to the snow-swept platform: a solitary passenger had reached the journey's end. The swirl of snow and sleet screaming out of the blackness at the end of the station building enveloped the porter in an instant, and cut his ears and neck with stinging force as he turned his back against the gale. A pair of lonely, half-obscured platform lights gleamed fatuously at the top of their icy posts at each end of the station; two or three frost-incrusted windows glowed dully in the side of the building, while one shone brightly where the operator sat waiting for the passing of No. 33.

An order had been issued for the stopping of the fast express at B——, a noteworthy concession in these days of premeditated haste. Not in the previous career of flying 33 had it even so much as slowed down for the insignificant little station, through which it swooped at midnight the whole year round. Just before pulling out of New York on this eventful night the conductor received a command to stop 33 at B—— and let down a single passenger, a circumstance which meant trouble for every dispatcher along the line.

The woman who got down at B—— in the wake of the shivering but deferential porter, and who passed by the conductors without lifting her face, was without hand luggage of any description. She was heavily veiled, and warmly clad in furs. At eleven o'clock that night she had entered the compartment in New York. Throughout the thirty miles or more she had sat alone and inert beside the snow-clogged window, peering through veil and frost into the night that whizzed past the pane, seeing nothing yet apparently intent on all that stretched beyond. As still, as immobile as death itself she had held herself from the moment of departure to the instant that brought the porter with the word that they were whistling for B——. Without a word she arose and followed him to the vestibule, where she watched him as he unfastened the outer door and lifted the trap. A single word escaped her lips and he held out his hand to receive the crumpled bill she clutched in her gloved fingers. He did not look at it. He knew that it would amply reward him for the brief exposure he endured on the lonely, wind-swept platform of a station, the name of which he did not know.

She took several uncertain steps in the direction of the station windows and stopped, as if bewildered. Already the engine was pounding the air with quick, vicious snorts in the effort to get under way; the vestibule trap and door closed with a bang; the wheels were creaking. A bitter wind smote her in the face; the wet, hurtling sleet crashed against the thin veil, blinding her.

The door of the waiting room across the platform opened and a man rushed toward her.

"Mrs. Wrandall?" he called above the roar of the wind.

She advanced quickly.

"Yes."

"What a night!" he said, as much to himself as to her. "I'm sorry you would insist on coming tonight. Tomorrow morning would have satisfied the—"

"Is this Mr. Drake?"

They were being blown through the door into the waiting room as she put the question. Her voice was muffled. The man in the great fur coat put his weight against the door to close it.

"Yes. Mrs. Wrandall. I have done all that could be done under the circumstances. I am sorry to tell you that we still have two miles to go by motor before we reach the inn. My car is open—I don't possess a limousine—but if you will lie down in the tonneau you will find some protection from—"

She broke in sharply, impatiently. "Pray do not consider me, Mr. Drake. I am not afraid of the blizzard."

"Then we'd better be off," said he, a note of anxiety in his voice—a certain touch of nervousness. "I drive my own car. The road is good, but I shall drive cautiously. Ten minutes, perhaps. I—I am sorry you thought best to brave this wretched—"

"I am not sorry for myself, Mr. Drake, but for you. You have been most kind. I did not expect you to meet me."

"I took the liberty of telephoning to you. It was well that I did it early in the evening. The wires are down now, I fear." He hesitated for a moment, staring at her as if trying to penetrate the thick, wet veil. "I may have brought you on a fool's errand. You see, I—I have seen Mr. Wrandall but once, in town somewhere, and I may be wrong. Still, the coroner—and the sheriff—seemed to think you should be notified—I might say questioned. That is why I called you up. I trust, madam, that I am mistaken."

"Yes," she said shrilly, betraying the intensity of her emotion. It was as if she lacked the power to utter more than a single word, which signified neither acquiescence nor approval.

He was ill at ease, distressed. "I have engaged a room for you at the inn, Mrs. Wrandall. You did not bring a maid, I see. My wife will come over from our place to stay with you if you—"

She shook her head. "Thank you, Mr. Drake. It will not be necessary. I came alone by choice. I shall return to New York tonight."

"But you—why, you can't do that," he cried, holding back as they started toward the door. "No trains stop here after ten o'clock. The locals begin running at seven in the morning. Besides—"

She interrupted him. "May we not start now, Mr. Drake? I am—well, you must see that I am suffering. I must see, I must know. The suspense—" She did not complete the sentence, but hurried past him to the door, throwing it open and bending her body to the gust that burst in upon them.

He sprang after her, grasping her arm to lead her across the icy platform to the automobile that stood in the lee of the building.

Disdaining his command to enter the tonneau, she stood beside the car and waited until he cranked it and took his place at the wheel. Then she took her seat beside him and permitted him to tuck the great buffalo robe about her. No word was spoken. The man was a stranger to her. She forgot his presence in the car.

Into the thick of the storm the motor chugged. Grim and silent, the man at the wheel, ungoggled and tense, sent the whirring thing swiftly over the trackless village street and out upon the open country road. The woman closed her eyes and waited.

You would know the month was March. He said: "It comes in like a lion," but apparently the storm swallowed the words for she made no response to them.

They crossed the valley and crept up the tree-covered hill, where the force of the gale was broken. If she heard him say: "Fierce, wasn't it?" she gave no sign, but sat hunched forward, peering ahead through the snow at the blurred lights that seemed so far away and yet were close at hand.

"Is that the inn?" she asked as he swerved from the road a few moments later.

"Yes, Mrs. Wrandall. We're here."

"Is—is he in there?"

"Where you see that lighted window upstairs." He tooted the horn vigorously as he drew up to the long, low porch. Two men dashed out from the doorway and clumsily assisted her from the car.

"Go right in, Mrs. Wrandall," said Drake. "I will join you in a jiffy."

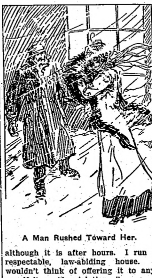
She walked between the two men into the feebly lighted office of the inn. The keeper of the place, a dreary looking person with dread in his eyes, hurried forward. She stopped, stock still. Some one was brushing the stubborn, thickly caked snow from her long chinchilla coat.

"You must let me get you something hot to drink, madam," the landlord was saying dolorously.

She struggled with her veil, finally tearing it away from her face. Then she took in the rather bare, cheerless room with a slow, puzzled sweep of her eyes.

"No, thank you," she replied.

"It won't be any trouble, madam," urged the other. "It's right here. The sheriff says it's all right to serve it, although it is after hours. I run a respectable, law-abiding house. I wouldn't think of offering it to anyone if it was in violation—"



A Man Rushed Toward Her.

"Never mind, Burton," interposed a big man, approaching. "Let the lady choose for herself. If she wants it, she'll say so. I am the sheriff, madam. This gentleman is the coroner, Dr. Sheef. We waited up for you after Mr. Drake said you'd got the fast train to stop for you. Tomorrow morning would have done quite as well. I'm sorry you came tonight in all this blizzard."

He was staring as if fascinated at the white, colorless face of the woman who with nervous fingers unfastened the heavy coat that enveloped her slender figure. She was young and strikingly beautiful, despite the intense pallor that overspread her face. Her dark, questioning, dreading eyes looked up into his with an expression he was never to forget. It combined dread, horror, doubt and a smoldering anger that seemed to overcast all other emotions that lay revealed to him.

"This is a—what is commonly called a 'road house'?" she asked dully, her eyes narrowing suddenly as if in pain.

"It is an inn during the winter, Mrs. Wrandall, and a road house in the summer, if that makes it plain to you. I will say, however, that Burton has always kept well within the law. This is the first — er — real bit of trouble he's had, and I won't say it's his fault. Keep quiet, Burton. No one is accusing you of anything wrong. Don't whine about it."

"But my place is ruined," groaned the doleful one. "It's got a black eye now. Not that I blame you, madam, but you can see how—"

He quailed before the steady look in her eyes, and turned away mumbling.

"There is a fire in the reception room, madam," said the coroner; "and the proprietor's wife to look out for you if you should require anything. Will you go in there and compose yourself before going upstairs? Or, if you would prefer waiting until morning, I shall not insist on the—er—ordeal tonight."

"I prefer going up there tonight," said she steadily.

The men looked at each other, and the sheriff spoke. "Mr. Drake is quite confident the—the man is your husband. It's an ugly affair, Mrs. Wrandall. We had no means of identifying him until Drake came in this evening, out of curiosity you might say. For your sake, I hope he is mistaken."

"Would you mind telling me something about it before I go upstairs? I am quite calm. I am prepared for anything. You need not hesitate."

"As you wish, madam. You will go into the reception room, if you please. Burton, is Mrs. Wrandall's room quite ready for her?"

"I shall not stay here tonight," interposed Mrs. Wrandall. "You need not keep the room for me."

"But, my dear Mrs. Wrandall—"

"I shall wait in the railway station until morning if necessary. But not here."

The coroner led the way to the cosy little room off the office. She followed with the sheriff. The men looked worn and haggard in the bright light that met them, as if they had not known sleep or rest for many hours.

"The assistant district attorney was here until eleven, but went home to get a little rest. It's been a hard case for all of us—a nasty one," explained the sheriff, as he placed a chair in front of the fire for her. She sank into it limply.

"Go on, please," she murmured, and shook her head at the nervous little woman who bustled up and inquired if she could do anything to make her more comfortable.

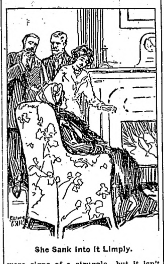
The sheriff cleared his throat. "Well, it happened last night. All day long we've been trying to find out who he is, and ever since eight o'clock this morning we've been searching for the woman who came here with him. She has disappeared as completely as if swallowed by the earth. Not a sign of a clew—not a shred. There's nothing to show when she left the inn or by what means. All we know is that the door to that room up there was standing half open when Burton passed by it at seven o'clock this morning—that is to say, yesterday morning, for this is now Wednesday. It is quite clear, from this, that she neglected to close the door tightly when she came out, probably through haste or fear, and the draft in the hall blew it wider open during the night. Burton says the inn was closed for the night at half-past ten. He went to bed. She must have slipped out after everyone was sound asleep. There were no other guests on that floor. Burton and his wife sleep on this floor, and the servants are at the top of the house and in a wing. No one heard a sound. We have not the remotest idea when the thing happened, or when she left the place. Dr. Sheef says the man had been dead six or eight hours when he first saw him, and that was very soon after Burton's discovery. Burton, on finding the door open, naturally suspected that his guests had skipped out during the night to avoid paying the bill, and lost no time in entering the room.

"He found the man lying on the bed, sprawled out, face upward and as dead as a mack—I should say, quite dead. He was partly dressed. His coat and vest hung over the back of a chair. A small service carving knife, belonging to the inn, had been driven squarely into his heart and was found sticking there. Burton says that the man, on their arrival at the inn, about nine o'clock at night, ordered supper sent up to the room. The tray of dishes, with most of the food untouched, and an empty champagne bottle, was found on the service table near the bed. One of the chairs was overturned. The servant who took the meal to the room says that the woman was sitting at the window with her wraps on, motor veil and all, just as she was when she came into the place. The man gave all the directions, the woman apparently paying no attention to what was going on. The waitress left the room without seeing her face. She had instructions not to come for the tray until morning.

"That was the last time the man was seen alive. No one has seen the woman since the door closed after the servant, who distinctly remembers hearing the key turn in the lock as she went down the hall. It seems pretty clear that the man ate and drank but not the woman. Her food remained untouched on the plate and her glass was full. 'Gad, it must have been a merry feast! I beg your pardon, Mrs. Wrandall!"

"Go on, please," said she levelly.

"That's all there is to say so far as the actual crime is concerned. There were signs of a struggle—but it isn't necessary to go into that. Now, as to their arrival at the inn. The blizzard had not set in. Last night was dark, of course, as there is no moon, but it was clear and rather warm for the time of year. The couple came here about nine o'clock in a high power runabout machine, which the man drove. They had no hand baggage and apparently had run out from New York. Burton says he was on the point of refusing them accommodations when the man handed him a hundred-dollar bill. It was more than Burton's cupidity could withstand. They did not register. The state license numbers had been removed from the automobile, which was of foreign make. Of course it was only a question of time until we could have found out who the car belonged to. It is perfectly obvious why he removed the numbers."



She Sank Into It Limply.

At this juncture Drake entered the room. Mrs. Wrandall did not at first recognize him.

"It has stopped snowing," announced the newcomer.

"Oh, it is Mr. Drake," she murmured. "We have a little French car, painted red," she announced to the sheriff without giving Drake another thought.

"And this one is red, madam," said the sheriff, with a glance at the coroner. Drake nodded his head. Mrs. Wrandall's body stiffened perceptibly, as if deflecting a blow. "It is still standing in the garage, where he left it on his arrival.

"Did no one see the face of—of the woman?" asked Mrs. Wrandall, rather querulously. "It seems odd that no one should have seen her face," she went on without waiting for an answer.

"It's not strange, madam, when you consider all the circumstances. She was very careful not to remove her veil or her coat until the door was locked. That proves that she was not the sort of woman we usually find gallavanting around with men regardless of—ahem, I beg your pardon. This must be very distressing to you."

"I am not sure, Mr. Sheriff, that it is my husband who lies up there. Please remember that," she said steadily. "It is easier to hear the details now, before I know, than it will be afterward if it should turn out to be as Mr. Drake declares."

"I see," said the sheriff, marveling.

"Besides, Mr. Drake is not positive," put in the coroner hopefully.

"I am reasonably certain," said Drake.

"Then all the more reason why I should have the story first," said she, with a shiver that no one failed to observe.

The sheriff resumed his conclusions. "Women of the kind I referred to a moment ago don't care whether they're seen or not. In fact, they're rather brazen about it. But this one was different. She was as far from that as it was possible for her to be. We haven't been able to find anyone who saw her face or who can give the least idea as to what she looks like, excepting a general description of her figure, her carriage and the outdoor garments she wore. We have reason to believe she was young. She was modestly dressed. Her coat was one of those heavy ulster affairs, such as a woman uses in motoring or on a sea voyage. There was a small sable stole about her neck. The skirt was short, and she wore high black shoes of the thick walking type. Judging from Burton's description she must have been about your size and figure, Mrs. Wrandall. Isn't that so, Mrs. Burton?"

The innkeeper's wife spoke. "Yes, Mr. Harben, I'd say so myself. About five feet six, I'd judge; rather slim and graceful like, in spite of the big coat."

Mrs. Wrandall was watching the woman's face. "I am five feet six," she said, as if answering a question.

The sheriff cleared his throat somewhat needlessly.

"Burton says she acted as if she were a lady," he went on. "Not the kind that usually comes out here on such expeditions, he admits. She did not speak to anyone, except once in very low tones to the man she was with, and then she was standing by the fireplace out in the main office, quite a distance from the desk. She went upstairs alone, and he gave some orders to Burton before following her. That was the last time Burton saw her. The waitress went up with a specially prepared supper about half an hour later."

"It seems quite clear, Mrs. Wrandall, that she robbed the man after stabbing him," said the coroner.

Mrs. Wrandall started. "Then she was not a lady, after all," she said quickly. There was a note of relief in her voice. It was as if she had put aside a half-formed conclusion.

"His pockets were empty. Not a penny had been left. Watch, cuff links, scarf pin, cigarette case, purse and bill folder—all gone. Burton had seen most of these articles in the office."

"Isn't it—but no! Why should I be the one to offer a suggestion that might be construed as a defense for this woman?"

"You were about to suggest, madam, that some one else might have taken the valuables—is that it?" cried the sheriff.

"Had you thought of it, Mr. Sheriff?"

"I had not. It isn't reasonable. No one about this place is suspected. We have thought of this, however: the murderess may have taken all of these things away with her in order to prevent immediate identification of her victim. She may have been clever enough for that. It would give her a start."

"Not an unreasonable conclusion, when you stop to consider, Mr. Sheriff, that the man took the initiative in that very particular," said Mrs. Wrandall in such a self-contained way that the three men looked at her in wonder. Then she came abruptly to her feet. "It is very late, gentlemen. I am ready to go upstairs, Mr. Sheriff."

"I must warn you, madam, that Mr. Drake is reasonably certain that it is your husband," said the coroner uncomfortably. "You may not be prepared for the shock that—"

"I shall not faint, Dr. Sheef. If it is my husband I shall ask you to leave me alone in the room with him for a little while." The final word trailed out into a long, tremulous wail, showing how near she was to the breaking point in her wonderful effort at self-control. The men looked away hastily. They heard her draw two or three deep, quavering breaths; they could almost feel the tension that she was exercising over herself.

The doctor turned after a moment and spoke very gently, but with professional firmness. "You must not think of venturing out in this wretched night, madam. It would be the worst kind of folly. Surely you will be guided by me—by your own common sense. Mrs. Burton will be with you—"

"Thank you, Dr. Sheef," she interposed calmly. "If what we all fear should turn out to be the truth, I could not stay here. I could not breathe. I could not live. If, on the other hand, Mr. Drake is mistaken, I shall stay. But if it is my husband, I cannot remain under the same roof with him, even though he be dead. I do not expect you to understand my feelings. It would be asking too much of men—too much."

"I think I understand," murmured Drake.

"Come," said the sheriff, arousing himself with an effort.

She moved swiftly after him. Drake and the coroner, following close behind with Mrs. Burton, could not take their eyes from the slender, graceful figure. She was a revelation to them. Feeling as they did that she was about to be confronted by the most appalling crisis imaginable, they could not but marvel at her composure. Drake's mind dwelt on the stories of the guillotine and the heroines who went up to it in those bloody days without so much as a quiver of dread. Somehow, to him, this woman was a heroine.

They passed into the hall and mounted the stairs. At the far end of the corridor a man was seated in front of a closed door. He arose as the party approached. The sheriff signed for him to open the door he guarded. As he did so, a chilly blast of air blew upon the faces of those in the hall. The curtains in the window of the room were flapping and whipping in the wind. Mrs. Wrandall caught her breath. For the briefest instant it seemed as though she was on the point of faltering. She dropped farther behind the sheriff, her limbs suddenly stiff, her hand going out to the wall as if for support. The next moment she was moving forward resolutely into the icy, dimly lighted room.

A single electric light gleamed in the corner beside the bureau. Near the window stood the bed. She went swiftly toward it, her eyes fastened upon the ridge that ran through the center of it: a still, white ridge that seemed without beginning or end.

With nervous fingers the attendant lifted the sheet at the head of the bed and turned it back. As he let it fall across the chest of the dead man he drew back and turned his face away.

She bent forward and then straightened her figure to its full height, without for an instant removing her gaze from the face of the man who lay before her: a dark-haired man gray in death, who must have been beautiful to look upon in the flush of life.

For a long time she stood there looking, as motionless as the object on which she gazed. Behind her were the tense, keen-eyed men, not one of whom seemed to breathe during the grim minutes that passed. The wind howled about the corners of the inn, but no one heard it. They heard the beating of their hearts, even the ticking of their watches, but not the wail of the wind.

At last her hands, claw-like in their tenseness, went slowly to her temples. Her head dropped slightly forward, and a great shudder ran through her body. The coroner started forward, expecting her to collapse.

"Please go away," she was saying in an absolutely emotionless voice. "Let me stay here alone for a little while."

That was all. The men relaxed. They looked at each other with a single question in their eyes. Was it quite safe to leave her alone with her dead? They hesitated.

She turned on them suddenly, spreading her arms in a wide gesture of self-absolution. Her somber eyes swept the group.

"I can do no harm. This man is mine. I want to look at him for the last time—alone. Will you go?"

"Do you mean, madam, that you intend to—" began the coroner in alarm.

She clasped her hands. "I mean that I shall take my last look at him now—and here. Then you may do what you like with him. He is your dead—not mine. I do not want him. Can you understand? I do not want this dead thing. But there is something I should say to him, something that I must say. Something that no one must hear but the good God who knows how much he has hurt me. I want to say it close to those gray, horrid ears. Who knows? He may hear me!"

Wondering, the others backed from the room. She watched them until they closed the door.

* * * * * * * *

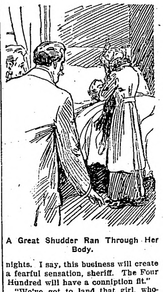
Listening, they heard her lower the window. It squealed like a thing in fear.

* * * * * * * *

Ten minutes passed. The group in the hall conversed in whispers.

"Poor thing," said the innkeeper's wife.

"Well," said Drake, taking a deep breath, "she won't have to worry any more about his not coming home nights. I say, this business will create a fearful sensation, sheriff. The Four Hundred will have a conniption fit."



A Great Shudder Ran Through Her Body.

"We've got to land that girl, whoever she is," grated the official. "Now that we know who he is, it shouldn't be hard to pick out the women he's been trailing with lately. Then we can sift 'em down until the right one is left. It ought to be easy."

CORN CAN BE GROWN ON CANADIAN PRAIRIES

Manitoba is now commencing to produce considerable corn, chiefly for feeding purposes. In some cases, where the crop can be matured into the dough stage, silos could be used and would be a profitable investment. According to the Farm and Ranch Review, a correspondent visited a field of corn in southern Manitoba on September 28. The corn then was untouched by frost and it stood on an average eight and nine feet in height. The corn had developed into the dough stage, and the crop would easily exceed 20 tons to the acre. At many experimental farms, the same favorable showing of the corn crop has manifested itself. At the Brandon experimental farm this year several varieties, all very good yielders, matured into good silo corn.

Considering the success with which corn can be produced, and the advantages to be gained by so producing it, should not it receive the serious attention of the western agriculturist?

Corn is successfully grown in the northern part of Minnesota in similar soil and under the same climatic condition, and there does not appear to be any reason why like results should not be secured in western Canada. It is the opinion of many American farmers of experience that the corn belt is extending northward. The prairie provinces must gradually take up with mixed farming. More stock on the farms must be raised, and in consequence farming must to some extent be diverted from grain growing to other necessary crops. If crops suitable for wintering cattle and especially dairy stock are to be grown, why should not corn be one of these crops? In Ontario and in the United States we find it forms the main bulky food for wintering beef and dairy cattle. They would not be without this profitable plant. In fact, since its introduction almost twice as much stock can be retained on the same amount of land, besides considering its great value for keeping the land clean. Some may say that many crops that can be grown in Ontario and the States cannot be grown here, but not so with corn, even now we find scattered fields of corn in Alberta and Saskatchewan.—Advertisement.

HARD TO CINCH JOBS

BUSHERS HAVE TROUBLE TRYING TO LAND IN MINORS.

Ogden Player Tosses Away Glove In Disgust After His Debut—Texan Got Two Home Runs and Then Fanned 7 Times.

Recruits trying to burst into the major leagues have fairly hard times in their tryouts. But they can't compare with the initiation of a busher trying to get a job for the first time with a minor league club.

This one was told at Salt Lake City of a youngster who had an idea he would like to play with the Ogden team. His name was Lathers and his only experience prior to his tryout was with sandlot teams at Salem, Ore. The Ogden manager told him to play left field during one of the spring games and Lathers took his place.

Somebody knocked a high easy fly which Lathers got in his hands, but let drop to the ground. Two scores came in. A couple of innings later he muffed a liner in murderous fashion and the climax came in the eighth, when a tall fly bounced off his head and lost the game for Ogden.

All this time he had been panned to the limit by the fans and he was getting so nervous he could scarcely walk without tripping. It was his turn to bat in the final round and he whiffed miserably. A gang of man and boys followed him from the park, jeering and laughing. Finally, in desperation, Lathers turned on them and said:

"If any of youse guys want to play left field there's my glove," and he threw a $2.50 mitt in the road. He was never heard of again in the Utah regions.

Another case was noted at San Antonio last spring while the second team of the White Sox was playing a series of exhibition games there. The Athletics had been training there and the enthusiasm of the Broncho adherents had been stirred up because of the numerous victories of their team over the world champs.

All that the Broncho manager wanted to make his team strong, according to his own notions, was a right fielder. He had been trying out his star catcher, Betts, at the place, but didn't want to weaken his backstopping department by the switch. So he welcomed a youth named Bogus, who strolled into his office the day the Sox arrived, and applied for a job.

Bogus had played in one of the smaller leagues in the great Southwest, and claimed to be a right fielder. He was tried out in the first game.

Joe Benz the butcher boy pitcher of the Sox was in the box and Bogus was the first man to face him in the second inning. He lifted a terrific homer over the short right field fence and the small crowd of fans went wild with glee. At San Antonio all home batters are trained to aim for that short fence, and Bogus seemed to have the range right off the reel.

"He's a wonder and a comer," the Broncho players exulted. And they could scarce contain their joy when Bogus hit another homer over the same fence in the fourth round, bringing Metz, the big first baseman, in home ahead of him. This made the score 3 to 2 in favor of San Antonio. Bogus certainly looked like a find and Acting Manager Doc White of the Sox looked him over carefully with a view of recommending him to Comiskey and Manager Callahan.

In the fifth, seventh and ninth innings Bogus struck out, missing the ball by a mile. But this didn't dampen the jubilation of San Antonio players or fans. "Wait till tomorrow," they said. "The kid'll show 'em again." For the Bronchos had won that initial combat, 10 to 6, and felt great.

Tomorrow came and Doc White decided to do a little pitching himself. He desired to see how Bogus would hit against a southpaw who had a change of pace. It might be mentioned Bogus was a left-handed hitter. Bogus struck out as a starter, not coming within a foot of White's tantilizing slow ball. The same thing happened in the fourth.

Uric Acid is Slow Poison

Unseen in its approach, hard to detect in its early stages, and cruelly painful in its later forms, uric acid poisoning is a disease too often fatal.

Bright's disease is one of the final stages of uric acid poisoning. It kills in our country every year more men and women than any other ailment except two—consumption and pneumonia. Bright's disease and uric acid poisoning usually start in some kidney weakness that would not be hard to cure, if discovered early, so it is well to know the early signs of kidney disease and uric poisoning.

When uric acid is formed too fast and the kidneys are weakened by a cold, or fever, by overwork, or by over-indulgences, the acid collects, the blood gets impure and heavy, there is headache, dizziness, heart palpitation, and a dull, heavy-headed, drowsy feeling with disturbances of the urine.

Real torture begins when the uric acid forms into gravel or stone in the kidney, or crystallizes into jagged bits in the muscles, joints or on the nerve tubings. Then follow the awful pains of neuralgia, rheumatism, gout, sciatica, neuritis, lumbago or kidney colic.

"Every Picture Tells a Story"

"I don't know what ails me."

It is but a further step to dropsy or Bright's disease.

Be warned by backache, by sediment in the kidney secretions, by painful, scant or too frequent passages. Cure the weakened kidneys. Use Doan's Kidney Pills—a medicine made just for weak kidneys, that has been proved good in years of use, in thousands of cases—the remedy that is recommended by grateful users from coast to coast.

SCREAMED ALOUD

In Agony With Awful Kidney Ailments

Mrs. Clara Brasch, 200 N. 16th St., Lexington, Mo., says: "My whole system was filled with uric acid poison. I had terrible, sharp, shooting pains in my head and sometimes I was so dizzy, I staggered and nearly fell. The poisoning affected my whole body and my hands, arms, limbs and ankles were swollen and sore. The pains got so bad I screamed and I thought I would die. I was nervous and languid and at times I had blinding spells. Remedies and physicians' prescriptions did me no good. In 1911 I heard of Doan's Kidney Pills and had some procured for me. After I had taken them a few days, the soreness and pain began to ease up and I felt a little stronger. In almost no time, I was up and around, in good health. Doan's Kidney Pills purified my whole system and there is no doubt that they saved my life. Since I was cured, I have had no further trouble."

WAS NOT REVENGEFUL MAN

But at the Same Time Dog Owner Meant That His Pet Should Have a Fair Show.

"I am not a revengeful man," said a Brooklyn real estate dealer, "but now and then I do want to get even. A few days ago I drove out as far as Mineola in a horse and buggy, and my dog followed me. He's no fighter as a dog, and it was a bad trip for him. Every time we passed a farmhouse a dog came rushing out to roll my canine in the dust, and he was licked 36 different times before we got home. I was sorry for him and mad at the other dogs, and three or four days later I got a loan of a mastiff and made the trip over again. There was fun from the start to finish. The same farmers' dogs came bounding off the fence to chew up something, and most of them got hold of the mastiff before they knew whether he was a poodle or an elephant. They saw their mistake too late. Lord, he slayed 'em right and left. He simply left a trail of howling, limping dogs from Prospect park to Mineola and back, and I've been told that some of the farmers along the road have offered as high as $20 for my scalp. No; I'm not a revengeful man, but I want to see my dog have a fair show in this world, don't you know."

The Only Way.

Little John was full of mischief and during his first year at school hardly a day passed that he was not sent to stand in the corner.

When the schoolhouse burned down and a new one was immediately begun, the little boy went to his father, who was county superintendent.

"Don't you think we could get the carpenter to build a round schoolhouse this time, father?" he said.

"Why, son?" his father asked in astonishment.

"Because," the little fellow answered, "I'm getting very tired of corners."

A Defect.

"How's that book you were just reading?"

"Oh, it's another of those publications in which a corking good title is spoiled by the story."

CLEVER WIFE

Knew How to Keep Peace in Family.

It is quite significant, the number of persons who get well of alarming heart trouble when they let up on coffee and use Postum as the beverage at meals.

There is nothing surprising about it, however, because the harmful alkaloid—caffeine—in coffee is not present in Postum, which is made of clean, hard wheat.

"Two years ago I was having so much trouble with my heart," writes a lady in Washington, "that at times I felt quite alarmed. My husband took me to a specialist to have my heart examined.

"The doctor said he could find no organic trouble but said my heart was irritable from something I had been accustomed to, and asked me to try and remember what disagreed with me.

"I remembered that coffee always soured on my stomach and caused me trouble from palpitation of the heart. So I stopped coffee and began to use Postum. I have had no further trouble since.

"A neighbor of ours, an old man, was so irritable from drinking coffee that his wife wanted him to drink Postum. This made him very angry, but his wife secured some Postum and made it carefully according to directions.

"He drank the Postum and did not know the difference, and is still using it to his lasting benefit. He tells his wife that the 'coffee' is better than it used to be, so she smiles with him and keeps peace in the family by serving Postum instead of coffee."

Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

DRY SCALE COVERED HEAD

2760 Tamm Ave., St. Louis, Mo.—"My little daughter's head began with a dry harsh scale covering it. First it got a white scale over the top and then it got a dirty brown scab with pus under it. Her hair came out in less than a week and her head itched and bled. She had no rest. I had her wear a scarf all the time, it looked so badly. She was so sore and had such big brown scabs on her head that the teacher would not let her attend school.

"We took and had her treated for three months with no relief. She kept getting worse until I tried Cuticura Soap and Ointment. I used the Cuticura Soap every third day and the Cuticura Ointment at night. In three weeks her head was well of sores. Two cakes of Cuticura Soap and one box of Cuticura Ointment completely cured her." (Signed) Mrs. Walter Rogers, Nov. 28, 1912.

NAPOLEON SMITH
Real Estate Promoter

By George Randolph
Chester

(Copyright by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

Captain Hammond passed the gate of the modest Smith residence at a good round clip, for he had his usual scant seconds to catch the eight twenty-seven. An elastic step at his side suddenly swung into perfect accord with his heel and toe rhythm, and a young voice, which nevertheless sounded like that of a "regular man," bade him a very cheerful good morning.

"Mr. Hammond, I want a job," was the next remark of the voice. Captain Hammond frowned and turned to find himself looking slightly upward, straight into the grin of young Napoleon Smith.

Now the grin of young Napoleon was the most infectious and ingratiating joy ever devised.

Meeting the grin, Captain Hammond relaxed and smiled in spite of himself.

"What can you do?" he asked.

"Hustle," stated young Smith in reply to the question.

This time Captain Hammond laughed outright.

"That's the most valuable asset you can own," he declared. "Your name's Smith, isn't it?"

Napoleon admitted that it was.

The eight twenty-seven just then whistled for Briarscot, and both men started to run.

"But about that job?" suggested young Smith again.

"Oh, yes," said the captain, and unconsciously he frowned once more. "I don't know of a thing at our place. You say you've had no business experience at all?"

"None that I care to tell about," replied the other, smiling reminiscently. "All through college I served as a correspondent for various papers, and through vacations I worked on general assignments on the Courier. I could go to work on the paper now, but the occupation doesn't seem to promise much of a future."

The captain nodded his head with a jerk.

"Choosing a profession is like making a wise investment," he said. "I understand your father's estate didn't cut up quite so well as was expected?"

"No," returned young Smith cheerfully. "It totaled to exactly nothing, and nothing to carry. You don't think, then, that there is anything in your place?"

"Not just now," said the captain. "However, I shall bear you in mind."

Captain Hammond strode into his office and fired off his usual morning question.

"Where's Bluffing?"

"Not down yet," said the girl of the straw-colored hair, slightly worried.

About half an hour later, Bluffing, a young man with a big straw hat and puffs under his eyes strolled in, smoking a cigarette, and, after a moment's deliberation, decided that he might as well work as not.

"Mr. Bluffing," said the captain, "I'd like to remind you that the address of this office is 710 Green street, and that we look forward with eager anticipation to the pleasure of your society between the hours of nine and twelve and one and five. If those hours seem a trifle inconvenient to you, you might state so in writing and I'll put the matter up to the board of directors."

"Very sorry, Mr. Hammond," said Bluffing with a wink at the straw-haired girl. "You see, we got caught in a jam at—"

"I don't give a continental what held you," responded Mr. Hammond. "The point is that we want you here at nine o'clock, with no excuse short of a broken leg."

On the second mail an excessively large order soothed the captain somewhat, and at noon the arrival of a tall, black-haired young lady with a color in her cheeks which never came from a chemist's shop, soothed him still more.

"I suppose you have a lot of old business engagements for luncheon, haven't you, daddy? Now tell me yes," she said.

"But I am going to tell you no," replied the captain, all smiles.

"Then," she informed him with a mock courtesy, "I am going to allow you to buy some eclairs and things for a stunning young lady to whom you may point with pride."

"By George, Margie," said the captain, now as gentle as any suckling lamb, "how you have developed! There is just a little bit of a pang in that last remark of yours. Some of these days it will be some other fellow's place to point with pride and fill all other male hearts with envy."

"Indeed!" she said, quite loftily, "maybe that time has already come."

He laughed and closed his eyes for a second.

"I had a queer experience this morning with young Smith, up in our suburb," he said.

"Pole Smith?" she inquired.

"Pole!" he repeated.

"Yes; Napoleon, you know. We called him Pole because he was such a gangling, spindle-legged youngster when we organized the Briarscot Tennis club. Since he's grown handsome he doesn't like the name very much, so we call it to him all the time."

"You know him pretty well, then?"

"Why, he fairly haunts our front porch! Haven't you seen him there?"

"No."

"Yes, you have, I know; but you're a fine, trustful daddy, and you never put a microscope on the young men I bring around."

"What sort of a fellow is this Pole Smith?" he asked.

"Why, daddy, he's a regular, sure-for-truly, cross-my-heart, hope-I-may die fellow."

He looked at her in affectionate wonder.

"If you had all those words in your system, I am glad you got them out," said he. "By the way, I formed about the same impression of your Pole Smith that you've given me. He's good to look at, and I've been remembering that wonderful grin of his all morning. It's like a drink of good wine."

"He's a perfectly grand grinner; he invented it, I think," agreed Marjorie, and they went to lunch.

That evening, just before closing time, Hammond looked suddenly up from his memoranda and snapped:

"Bluffing, did you see about securing that adjoining tract of land for the extension of the Eureka Works?"

"Why—no," faltered Mr. Bluffing, "I haven't seen to it yet."

"You haven't!" roared Hammond, "Bluffing, I am going to pain you. Go do business with the cashier, and don't bother to come back and shake hands. Good-by."

That evening, after having accepted the angry resignation of the girl with the straw-colored hair, the captain took a train 15 minutes earlier than his accustomed one, and stopped at the gray cottage of the Smiths' on his way up to his own big stone residence at the end of the boulevard. In answer to his ring a very pretty brown-haired girl came to the door, and Captain Hammond, whose heart was growing younger through the day's experience, fairly beamed upon her.

"My goodness me! And you're one of the grown-up Smith children, too, aren't you?" he said, as one awakening to a startling discovery.

"Yes, Captain Hammond," she replied, dimpling. "I'm June."

"Where's your brother?"

"Oh, he's up at your house playing tennis, I think. We were just going up to join them," and she looked back over her shoulder and smiled, as a chubby young fellow of about twenty-two strolled out hatless and saluted the captain with a flourish of his hand.

"Hell, Peters!" said the captain; "you're a great one. I never see you twice with the same girl."

"Hush!" said Billy Peters in a careful burlesque of a confidential undertone. "I don't dare encourage any of them too much." And he gave a fine imitation of a man yawning.

"Some of these days, my boy," warned the captain, laughing, "you're going to be so hard hit that it will make a man of you. By the way, June, I'm suddenly so interested in all you young people that I forgot my errand. I understand that your brother is looking for a position.'

"Oh, no!" she said, beaming with sisterly pride, "he found one this morning."

Then the captain, who usually tried to be most circumspect in the company of ladies, forgot himself.

"Hell!" he said.

Napoleon Smith had "scouted" in perhaps a dozen places before a good Samaritan led him to the offices of Forsythe and Spencer. They called themselves promoters, did Forsythe and Spencer, although they chiefly promoted real estate deals and would follow a dollar through Hades, or until they had annexed it. Forsythe's hair, face, mustache and beard were the color of a dish of ice cream, and he looked up at one through shrewd old eyes which bored down through the soul to the pockets.

"Yes, Mr. Smith," he quavered in his high-pitched and nasal voice, "we do need a man, but I'm afraid from what you tell me that you haven't had enough business experience."

"Assuming that you are correct," he said, "how much money would you be willing to pay me?"

"Ten dollars a week."

Napoleon grinned. Forsythe liked that grin; he knew it had commercial value, and he waited with concealed anxiety for the answer.

"And what would I be expected to do?"

"Anything you're told."

"No," decided Mr. Smith. "One gets more money for that. We'll say about 25 dollars, and even then there'd have to be reservations."

Around the corners of Forsythe's mouth there came an unfamiliar twitch, and after a hard struggle the corners turned upward.

"I see," he said. "Well, Mr. Smith, suppose we leave the question of salary an open one. Suppose you work with us for two weeks. At the end of that time, we'll sit down and have a good quarrel upon the matter of pay."

"I'll take you," said Napoleon, with an alacrity which almost startled the older man.

"Come in and meet Mr. Spencer," he said, grimly.

So it came about that Napoleon Smith was put out in Sunnyview and began the herculean task of selling building lots to prospective home-seekers. The first week he was well-nigh discouraged, for, in spite of all his engaging efforts and his pleasing personality, and even despite his grin, the flock of people attracted by the Forsythe and Spencer advertising came and looked at the appalling forsakenness of the place and went away; and by Saturday noon he had only sold eight lots.

"What do you think of that Smith boy?" said Forsythe, rubbing his bloodless old hands together. "He sold eight of those Sunnyview stickers. It's a record for that type of place."

"Keep him out there," advised Mr. Spencer sagely. "And tell him he'll have to do better if he's going to stay with us."

A hint to that effect on the following Tuesday, however, set Napoleon, heretofore humble, upon his defense.

"I'm doing the best I can, and hope to do better," he declared. "What ought my sales to reach?"

"Well—um—not less than 15 lots," stated Forsythe.

The younger man was silent for a moment, looking into the beady little wrinkled eyes of his employer.

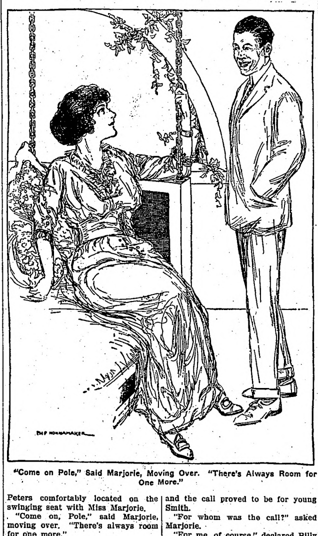
"How much profit do you make on those lots?" he suddenly asked.

Mr. Forsythe visibly winced.

"Profits!" he exclaimed. "Um—you see, Mr. Smith, it's impossible to tell until we're all through, on account of advertising expenses, cost of selling, and other items, to say nothing of the heavy investment in the site."

The famous grin sprang into instant illumination, and scared the astute Mr. Forsythe nearly into heart disease.

"Yes," said the owner of the grin with calm joy, "I met the former proprietor of that land out at Sunnyview just yesterday, and he told me your exact investment. I think, Mr. Forsythe, that on Saturday night I am going to have more salary than I have mentioned; or else I may go on a commission basis."



"Come on Pole," Said Marjorie, Moving Over. "There's Always Room for One More."

Napoleon walked up on the moonlit Hammond porch and found Billy Peters comfortably located on the swinging seat with Miss Marjorie.

"Come on, Pole," said Marjorie, moving over. "There's always room for one more."

"Indeed there's not," declared Billy, moving squarely into the center of the remaining space. "Go away, Pole Smith, I'm making love."

Napoleon regarded him for a moment with tolerant humor.

"All right, Billy," he agreed. "Where's your father, Margie?"

"He's in the library," she replied, laughing as he had done, at Billy Peters' drawling avowal.

As he walked away, Marjorie looked after his tall figure with appreciation.

"Isn't he a certainly fellow?" she observed.

"Declared irregular," announced Billy cheerfully. "Against the rules to ask any smitten swain to praise the deadly rival."

"Billy, Billy," she laughed. "Don't you ever think of anything serious?"

In the meantime, Napoleon sought the library where Captain Hammond, then poring over his plans for the extension of the Eureka Iron mills, arose instantly with a smile of pleasure and extended his hand.

"Well, Pole," he said, "you got away from me."

"I couldn't wait," explained Pole.

"How do you like your new place?" went on the captain, offering him a cigar.

"Oh, it's interesting, though I'm not sure I'd like it for a life occupation. It's wonderful how much business can be done on a small amount of ready money. I find Forsythe and Spencer are swinging that whole Sunnyview deal on an initial cash payment of a thousand dollars, mortgage notes for the balance. They do a big business in options, too, I've found, and they make a dollar go farther than I'd ever dreamed it could reach."

"You've only known the spending dollars," returned the captain with a smile. "A single, ordinary, spending dollar is of no more use than a safety razor at a colored picnic, but a business dollar has no time for foolishness. I'd like to see you succeed, Smith. To do that you've got to appreciate that there's no sentiment or friendship in business. If there is, the business fails. Remember that, will you?"

"I'm not likely to forget it," replied Napoleon seriously. "It was because of such lovable weaknesses that my father failed."

"Yes," admitted the captain. "Your father always was a sentimentalist, and he lost many a good opportunity through it. The sooner you get out of your head, young man, that money has any emotions, the better off you'll be."

"I see," said Napoleon dryly.

"The quicker you see, the better," insisted the captain, dwelling upon the subject so strongly that one might think he had really almost need to defend himself. "Where would I have been if I had stopped for such considerations? As it is, I built the Eureka iron mills out of nothing—a little bit of a 16 by 20 shop, where we made plain castings—to its present 20-acre spread. Not only that, but we must have more room, large additions, too, right away."

"Where is your plant?" asked young Smith with growing interest.

"Out on the Cedarpong division of the L. & I., at Hammondville."

"Hammondville! Why, I pass the Hammondville station every day on my way to the Sunnyview addition, but I never noticed your plant."

"No, we haven't the business advantages that we ought to have," admitted the captain; "I'm thinking of cutting away the sand ridge which shuts off the view of our factory from the railroad."

Just then the telephone bell rang, and the call proved to be for young Smith.

"For whom was the call?" asked Marjorie.

"For me, of course," declared Billy Peters. "I'll gamble it was some one of the girls calling me up."

"No," said Napoleon abstractedly, thinking upon other matters so deeply that he had no time to reply to Billy Peters in his own banter. "It's from June. She wants me to come down and get her."

"Just what I told you," said Billy triumphantly. "I wish your sister would quit following me around. You ought to speak to her about it, Pole. But never mind; you stay here, and I'll go ahead. You may try to make love to Margie while I am gone."

"Trying to make love to Margie is rather a bromide," said Napoleon. "Everybody has the same idea." Nevertheless, he sat down most comfortably and contentedly by Marjorie's side, and allowed Billy Peters to stroll negligently after his sister.

Hammondville consisted of a station and three streets of well-populated workmen's cottages. Beyond, reached by a wagon road and a spur track, was the Eureka plant, a low-lying collection of brick buildings which sprawled in every direction. To the front was a sand ridge; to the rear, the sound; to the east, a stretch of level land; and to the west, an equal area which, however, was one-third marsh. As young Smith stepped into view around the turn of the road, workmen were removing the "for sale or lease" sign from the better tract, and Napoleon stopped to look upon this operation with a trace of annoyance.

"Quick work," he said. Then he approached the workmen. "Who's bought this place?" he asked.

"I couldn't tell you, sir," said the older man of the crew. "Mr. Panz told us to move the sign over to Greeneck."

Panz was the real estate agent whose name was on the board, and with a sigh Napoleon saw he had been correct in his surmise; that the captain had taken extraordinarily prompt action.

"A fool's errand," he told himself. He hurried back to the station, where there was a public 'phone, and called up Panz's office.

"I understand you have a tract of land for sale at Hammondville," he observed.

"I couldn't tell you about that," said the clerk at the other end. "Who's this speaking?"

"Smith, of Forsythe and Spencer's office."

"Oh! I'll find out about it right away, Mr. Smith." Then a moment later: "We no longer have control of that tract. It was sold yesterday."

"To whom?"

"To the Consolidated Hame-ring Manufacturing company, which we understand intends to erect an extensive plant there."

"Good," said Smith. "Thank you," and he rang off.

"Who owns that piece of property to the west of the Eureka iron mills?" he asked the station agent.

"Mrs. McGundy," said the lantern-jawed station agent, scraping his finger nail tenderly over his nose. "She lives in that sky-blue house just to the end of the frog pond."

Napoleon hurried away to the little blue house, where he found Mrs. McGundy to be a globular person cut into two hemispheres by an apron string.

"Mrs. McGundy," queried Napoleon, "do you wish to sell your land over here?"

"Show me the man that will buy it?" said she. "I surely could part with it without breaking my heart. Twenty years ago, when Jim bought it for a song, it was supposed that if we held on to it for 20 years it would be worth all the money in the mint, but in all that time never have I seen the man that would ever be wanting that land, unless it would be Captain Hammond. But he don't want it. Twice I have gone myself to sell it to him, and twice he gave me to understand that if he bought any land it would be the other piece. You're not representing Captain Hammond?"

"No," said Napoleon brisky. "What will you take for the land?"

"Well, there's 20 acres, and it's worth, Jim always said, 200 dollars an acre. That's $4,000. Give me that and I'll take the next steamer for Dublin."

"I can't give you the four thousand cash," said Smith, "but I'll give you one thousand cash, and a mortgage note on the balance, payable in 60 days. You can wait the two months for the collection of that note, or you can probably discount it."

"Let me understand that," said Mrs. McGundy.

He carefully explained to her about the mortgage note, and with each period she nodded her round gray head emphatically.

"It sounds well," she said, "and you seem like an honest boy. But before I say aye, yes, or no, I'll go in and see Mr. McShane of McShane and McShane. Do you know Mr. McShane?"

Mr. Smith was unfortunate enough never to have had that pleasure, and he expressed himself contritely about it.

"What time does the next train go?" he wanted to know. "Can you come to town with me right now?"

Mrs. McGundy looked him over carefully, and glanced at the clock.

"Lord love you, boy!" she said. "What a ragin', tearin' hurry you're in! Oh, well, it's been many a long day since I took a jaunting with a handsome-looking young fellow like yourself, and I think I'll treat myself to it just this once. There's a train goes in about 20 minutes. Do you go down to the station and wait, and in due time I'll come along with my best bib and tucker on."

Napoleon lost no time in getting down to the station, and lost no time, furthermore, in calling Captain Hammond by 'phone.

"This is young Smith, Captain Hammond," said he. "I want to borrow a thousand dollars."

"Oh, you do?" inquired the captain. "On what security?"

"Mortgage on our house," returned Napoleon crisply.

"When do you want it?"

"Within an hour or so. Captain, I want you to let me have the check this morning and let me fix up the mortgage with you tomorrow."

"It isn't business, but I'll do it," agreed the captain after some hesitation. "But would you mind telling me what you want it for?"

"Oh, I have a little real estate opportunity."

The captain pondered a moment.

"You want to be careful about that," he warned. "Real estate deals are not always what they appear on the surface."

Napoleon Smith grinned sweetly into the 'phone.

"I'll guarantee this one to be all right," he confidently affirmed.

"All right," said the captain. "Come into the office and get your check at any time."

On the way to McShane and McShane Napoleon had Mrs. McGundy stop a moment in the lobby of the Kingston building while he ran up to Captain Hammond's office and got his check. Still on the way, he stopped and deposited that check at the bank where he had a small account, and then was ready for business. The broad-boned old lawyer would have made the deal pompous and difficult had he been left alone, but Mrs. McGundy stopped him as soon as she saw his direction.

"Stop your blatherin' and foolin' now, Terrence," she commanded. "Hurry up and finish the business with this young man. I like the cheerful face of him."

After that, Napoleon went out to Sunnyview and sold lots with particular vim and energy.

Mr. Forsythe, having sent for his new assistant in extreme haste in the afternoon of the same day, peered up at that young man with something tigerish in the expression of his white old face.

"I understand that you secured possession of a tract of land in Hammondville," said he, "and that you only purchased it this morning."

Napoleon grinned cheerfully.

"All quite true," he confessed.

"Don't you know that was most unethical?" demanded Mr. Forsythe. "Why, in our employ, and upon our time, you took occasion to do some private business for yourself in our exact line!"

"Yes, sir," admitted Mr. Smith, with no abatement of his pleasant expression. "How do you come to know about it?"

"Because Mr. Hammond called us up early this morning and commissioned us to buy that very piece of ground for him."

The grin of Napoleon was positively radiant now.

"Do you think I ought to turn it over to you?"

"Well not exactly that," said Mr. Forsythe. "But as our employe, you are bound to consult our interests. Captain Hammond has commissioned us to secure this piece of property, which he imagined could be purchased for $4,000. You have purchased it, and I presume intend to sell it to him at an increased price. Now, we might arrange to fix the price between Forsythe and Spencer and yourself, and you and us split the profits."

Napoleon paused for an extra special grin.

"No, I resign," he stated. "That's a still better scheme. Now I'll sell you that land for $6,000 cash."

In vast pain Mr. Forsythe eventually was compelled to call up Mr. Hammond, and inform that gentleman that the land for his extension would cost him the modest sum of $6,000.

"Buy it," directed Hammond.

"I might add," said Mr. Forsythe with a malignant glance at his ex-employe, "that the property in question is at present owned by young Smith, formerly in our employ, but today resigned."

"Smith!" exclaimed Hammond. "Is he in your office now? If he is, put him on the 'phone." And if Mr. Forsythe indicated the captain's desire to Napoleon, he could hear the captain, at the other end of the wire, saying to himself: "Well, I'll be damned!"

"Look here," demanded the captain of young Smith, "did you actually have the nerve to borrow that thousand dollars from me this morning to buy the very piece of property you knew I wanted, so as to compel me to pay you a two-thousand-dollar profit on the loan?"

"That's right, captain," admitted Napoleon cheerfully.

"Well, Smith, don't you think that was a little ungrateful and unfriendly? Don't you think you stepped over the bounds of both business and social ethics?"

"By no means," said Napoleon. "You told me yourself, just the other night, that business knows no friendship, and that a dollar has no sentiments or emotions. Moreover, captain, I intend to retrieve the reputation my father made with you for allowing his feelings to interfere with business. Do you want this property at six thousand?"

"Of course I do, you young ingrate," said the captain.

"All right," laughed Napoleon. "I'll be right over, thank you."

"Thank nothing!" snorted the captain. "I ought to have you arrested."

That night as the captain sat in the library, Marjorie came in to use the telephone, and paused behind her father's chair to pull his ears.

"Who's that you have with you on the porch, Margie?" he asked.

"Pole Smith," she informed him. "He's just telling me all about how well he's going to like business. He says he made $2,000 in one deal today."

"Yes, confound it, he did!" exploded the captain. "He made it out of my pocket and borrowed my money to do it with."

Her laugh upon that was delicious; so much so that the captain stopped to listen to it in positive joy, all his annoyances of the day, forgotten.

"I guess I'm a lemon," he confessed, laughing with her.

"A nickel's worth of them," she agreed, twisting two corkscrews in his gray hair. "I should think that a shrewd old business tiger like you would feel humiliated to have a mere youngster like Pole Smith come along and eat him all up."

The captain smiled grimly.

"He's a fine chap, young Smith is," he said.

She slipped her arm around his neck and laid her cheek against his.

"A fine chap? Just finding it out? Daddy, daddy, daddy! You don't keep up with the news very well, do you?"

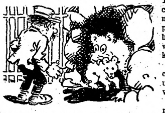
HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Hides Cubs in Cave; Defies Keepers to Enter

NEW YORK.—Park attendants have been trying for days to learn just how many bear cubs there are in a cave at the back of one of the large cages in the zoological park in the Bronx. Just when they were born is not known. They only learned that there were cubs in the cave when Colorado, a female North American brown bear, appeared at the entrance a week ago bearing one of them in her mouth. It was not any bigger than a cat, the keeper who saw it said.



There are three other bears in the cage with the mother, and they lined up in front of the entrance and prevented an inspection of the cave.

Later the keepers learned that Colorado had more than one cub, but just how many more is still a matter of doubt. Superintendent Snyder is sure there are three youngsters behind the rock, but Keeper Degon insists there are only two.

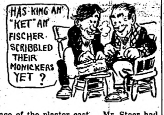
Interest in the welfare of the cubs became so great among the keepers that one of them undertook to explore the cave and find out how many cubs there were and how they were getting on. He waited until the other bears were dozing after a hearty meal. Then opened the door at the rear of the inclosure and stepped in, swinging the door softly shut behind him. He was creeping toward the cave when suddenly the mother bear appeared in the entrance.

She had a cub in her mouth, for each day she brings one of them out into the sunshine, stands guard over it for ten minutes or so, and then gravely catches the youngster up by the scruff of the neck and carries it back into the cave. She was on the way out to give one of the cubs its airing when the keeper encountered her. She growled savagely, and the keeper backed quickly to the door, reached a hand out behind him and opened it.

Colorado, with a quick turn of her head, tossed the cub just inside the cave. Then, still growling, she cleared the few feet between the cave and the cage door with remarkable speed, reaching it just as the keeper stepped through.

Leg's Plaster Cast Adorned With Autographs

ST. LOUIS, MO.—With the single exception of a thoroughly well-broken leg. William C. Steer, haberdasher and baseball enthusiast de luxe, is all right. It had been three weeks since Mr. Steer broke the leg. Shortly after he was transported to his Waterman avenue home, tenderly placed in bed and then awaited the arrival of the surgical instruments and the plaster of paris.



HAS KING AN' "KET" AN' FISCHER SCRIBBLED THEIR MONICKERS YET ?

The leg was reset, the plaster of paris was generously plastered around the broken member, and become as hard and irresistible as re-enforced concrete.

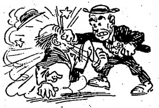
Visitors to the Steer home who journeyed thitherward to sympathize with the hero of the broken leg were requested—and always complied—to annex their signatures to the white surface of the plaster cast. Mr. Steer had broken his leg, therefore it was up to him to break the monotony. Gathering a collection of celebrated autographs on the plaster cast was one of the means to the aforesaid end.

S. P. Britton was one of the callers and readily affixed his signature to the temporary covering of the broken leg. Mrs. Britton, who owns the Cardinals, proved that she was no piker by writing her own name in clear, legible script.

It can be safely predicted that he will be in the stands when the umps start the ball to rolling 'round about the midsection of April.

Called O'Brien "Cohen"—and Then It Happened

DETROIT, MICH.—To begin with, Cohen is not an Irish name. "What caused this fight?" asked Judge Gainey in police court the other day, when Sol Lefkowitz and Connie O'Brien were brought before him as being the principals in a street fracas at Gratiot avenue and Hastings street.



"Yer honor—he shlandered me!" said Connie O'Brien and nearly wept from mortification. "Sez he ter me, judge, just as Oi'm sayin' ter you—sez he ter me, sezzee, 'Hello, Cohen;' just like thot, yer honor."

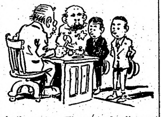
"Is that true, Sol?" asked Judge Gainey, sternly.

"A mistake it was I made, judge—I swear it!" said Sol Lefkowitz, earnestly. "Never I would have said it if an Irisher I knew he was. Like this it was, Mr. Judge, so help me! Me, I was along Hasting street going an' I ain't mindin' nobody else's business at all, when a man was coming an' he just like Joe Cohen looked an' like a good friend I said it, 'Hello, Cohen.'

Judge Gainey advised O'Brien to go easy on the liquid which provokes visions of St. Patrick's pets and informed him that the next time he is brought in it will mean a vacation in a cell, while Sol, whose only fault was poor eyesight, was released forthwith.

Masher Boys in Rouge; "Good Morning, Judge"

KANSAS CITY, MO.—The Brothers Jackson—Davis and Edgar—said "Good morning, judge," for the first time in their lives when they were presented to Judge Burney in the North side municipal court the other morning. An undignified charge of mashing was against them.



When they were arrested the day before coming out of a Main street store they were clad in tight-fitting black suits with narrow pencil stripes. They wore the latest style of tall pearl gray hats and deep pointed collars. At police headquarters a stick of rouge was found in the possession of Davis, who is nineteen years old.

Edgar, a year older, carried a face powder box and a chamois skin with a fringe of lace around it, a carmen hue in the center. The amazed policemen at headquarters searched them for mesh bags, but didn't find any.

In police court the two, slightly rumpled after a night in jail, viewed the cosmetics in surprise.

"My goodness, judge," protested Davis, "that rouge belongs to my sister, and I just happened to by carrying it."

"And that powder rag and powder is what I use after shaving," Edgar said. "Heaven knows, we all use powder."

"And as for flirting, we know those girls perfectly well," Davis explained.

Judge Burney gave up.

"I'll fine you $25 apiece," he said said weakly. "There are some things that even a judge doesn't know how to handle."

HORSE NAMED FOR LITTLETON

"When Martin W. Littleton was a young man he went to Texas from Tennessee as a laborer for a railroad," said John Walker, a New York newspaper man, the other day. "Even then he was confident that he was destined for political honors. A foreman named G. W. Scott and Littleton got to be good friends. Littleton finally was promoted to be a paymaster, and after serving in that capacity for some time, he announced one day that he was going to quit and go to New York. He informed Scott that some day he would be mayor of New York, then governor, and after that, well, he wouldn't make any further prediciton. Scott gave up railroad work and went into breeding thoroughbred horses.

"Littleton reached New York and after a number of years became borough president of Brooklyn, and then member of congress from the Oyster Bay district. He hasn't reached the mayoralty as yet, but there is plenty of time, for Littleton is still a young man. Scott prospered in the racehorse business, and a year or two ago brought East a stable of pretty good horses. He bred all of his horses, and about five years ago he picked out two of the most likely youngsters and announced that he would name them after his best friends. For one he claimed the name of Senator Bailey, but he found on application to the Jockey club that the name had been taken, whereupon he called the horse J. H. Houghton. The other colt he gave the name of Martin W. Littleton. This latter horse turned out to be a first-class racer."

DIAZ SEES NO HOPE OF PEACE

Gen. Felix Diaz, nephew of ex-President Porfirio Diaz of Mexico, arrived in New York a short time ago from Havana, accompanied by his wife and four of his fellow-countrymen, Joseph B. Sandoval, his lawyer; Dr. Pedro del Villas, his secretary; Dr. Richard del Rio, and Capt. Hector Arostegui. The Mexican general has not a warlike appearance. He is short, plump, with large, dark eyes, dark hair, and a heavy mustache. In his gray suit he resembles an Italian opera impresario more than a military man.

In an interview General Diaz showed that he was a diplomat. To questions that he did not care to answer, he replied courteously that his English was not so good. At other times he answered and apparently understood what was said without any difficulty.

The general denied that he had any intention of starting another revolution in Mexico. He said he had come to New York to visit friends for a few days. The stab wound received recently in Havana had healed, the general said, and he was in perfect health. His future plans are indefinite. He might go to Europe.

"What will happen if Villa wins in the struggle against the federal troops?" he was asked.

"The federal soldiers," said General Diaz, "are the only properly organized forces that can restore peace in Mexico. Villa is trying to exterminate them. If he succeeds, it will not bring peace to the country. There will be nothing but bloodshed. Villa would not be able to control his own men if he won."

MAY HEAD FEDERAL BANK BOARD

The governor of the new banking system of the United States probably will be Walker Hill, now president of the Mechanics-American National bank of St. Louis. Mr. Hill has been tendered this post at the head of the federal reserve bank board by President Wilson and the appointment has been accepted, it is said.

By the terms of the Owen-Glass currency law the governor is the active executive officer of the new system. and his office is the most important financial position, with the possible exception of the secretaryship of the treasury, within the gift of the government.

The governor is one of the five members of the board to be appointed by the president. Secretary of the Treasury William G. McAdoo and Comptroller of the Currency John Skelton Williams will be ex-officio members.

Mr. Hill stands high in the banking business, and it is expected that his appointment will be acceptable to business interests of the country generally.

ELEANOR WILSON TO WED

"The President and Mrs. Wilson announce the engagements of their youngest daughter, Eleanor Randolph, to Hon. William Gibbs McAdoo."

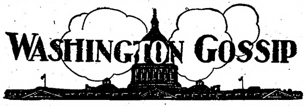
This announcement was issued at the White House by Secretary Tumulty a few days ago.

For weeks there had been rumors that the president's daughter and the secretary of the treasury would be married soon. The exact date of the wedding is not known.

There has been extraordinary interest in the engagement among officials and the many friends of both Miss Wilson and the cabinet officer. The youngest of the family, Miss Eleanor is said to be her father's pet, and there is a strong personal friendship between the president and the man who is to marry his daughter.

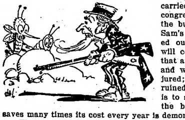
Reports that Secretary McAdoo would retire from the cabinet after his marriage, and perhaps become ambassador to France were set at rest by White House officials, who said emphatically that he was expected to remain at the head of the treasury department.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP



Bugs to Cost Uncle Sam $800,000 in Year 1915

WASHINGTON.—Bugs! Bugs that fly and bugs that burrow, bugs that bite and bugs that sting, big bugs and tiny bugs, ladybugs, and bugs anything but ladylike, are going to cost the federal government $800,000 during the fiscal year of 1915. That is the amount carried in the agricultural bill before congress. Dr. L. O. Howard, chief of the bureau of entomology and Uncle Sam's champion bug hunter, has pointed out, however, that these insects will cost the country fully 100 times that amount in cotton destroyed; corn and wheat and other grain crops injured; forests devastated; root crops ruined and fields laid almost bare. It is to stop such ravages as these that the bureau is maintained. That it saves many times its cost every year is demonstrated easily by statistics.

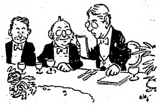


The biggest bug from the standpoint of destructiveness is the boll weevil; which is slowly but certainly retreating before the attacks of government scientists. But the "sinews of war" provided by the appropriation bill also are wanted for campaigns against the gipsy moth, which attacks tree foliage; the horn worm, that destroys tobacco plants; the cane insect that lays low cane fields; the alfalfa weevil, which attacks that crop; the cinch bug, that sucks the life from wheat and cornstalks; the codling moth, that spoils tree fruits; the pine beetle, and the bark beetle. The latter insect is a serious menace to the national and private forests, because it destroys millions of feet of standing timber.

"We have undertaken an extensive study of the house fly," said Dr. Howard. "In the small farm and village 99 per cent of the house flies are bred in stable refuse, and we have been co-operating with the bureau of chemistry to find some substance that will kill the larvae and not impair the fertilizing value of the refuse."

Thought He Read From Congressional Record

EVERY one who has read "Chimmie Fadden" knows "Ned" Townsend, the author, and now representing a district in northern New Jersey. So much for the introduction. "Ned" Townsend had to make a speech in Newark the other day, and as he had some serious thoughts to impart, he went to the trouble of writing out a portion of the things he really wanted to deliver to that after-dinner audience. When he reached Newark a reporter for the Call spotted him and asked him if he had an advance copy of the stuff he was about to get off his chest.



"I have this bunch of notes," said Townsend, "and that is all."

The reporter said he could take the notes to the office, have them set up in type and promised to send a proof of the remarks back to Townsend in plenty of time for dinner. All of which he did.

Mr. Townsend arose in his appointed time, and after delivering himself of the usual introductory remarks, said that as he had a serious purpose in mind he would like permission to read some of the things he had written on the train going north. And he pulled out the proof.

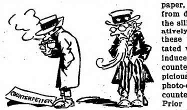
The next speaker was a bank examiner. He started off something like this:

"Gentlemen, you have been imposed upon. You have heard Mr. Townsend say that he wrote out his speech on the train, but I have been watching him every minute and I tell you upon my word of honor that he did not read from a written manuscript at all. He read from the Congressional Record."

Whereupon every one laughed. Townsend can tell that story to men who know the speed with which newspaper proofs are "pulled" after the "copy" goes into the composing room, but it would never have done to try to explain at a dinner that he read from the proof of a speech he had handed to a newspaper reporter only an hour or two previous.

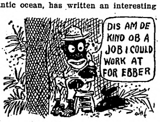
No Secret in the Manufacture of Money Paper

THERE is an erroneous idea, very generally held, that paper money is printed on paper manufactured by a secret process, which is carefully guarded from the public. The truth is that almost any paper house could make the identical paper, were it not prohibited by law from doing so. The matter of getting the silk fiber into the fabric is comparatively simple, and the appearance of these tiny shreds, often cleverly imitated with a fine pen, not infrequently induces the inexperienced to accept a counterfeit bill of which they are suspicious. With the development of photo-engraving the shady art of counterfeiting received a big impetus. Prior to that industry only experts could hope to produce bills that would pass even casual inspection. And as man's handiwork always expresses his individuality, the "thumb print" of every counterfeiter was literally on every bill he put out. Today, however, bills may be duplicated by a purely mechanical process; but the lines are heavy and uneven.



Negro Used for Mosquito Bait in Canal Zone

COL. WILLIAM L. SIBERT, U. S. A., builder of the Gatun locks, the Gatun dam, the breakwater at Colon harbor, and the excavation of the channel between the Gatun locks and the Atlantic ocean, has written an interesting article on the Panama canal, his first contribution on the subject, for the National Geographic society. In his article, Colonel Sibert humorously writes of the effort to rid the Canal Zone of mosquities.



DIS AM DE KIND OB A JOB I COULD WORK AT FOR EBBER

"In 1912 Gatun had probably the greatest influx of malarial mosquitoes in its history," he writes. "The sanitary department determined to locate all the breeding places of mosquitoes near Gatun, catch mosquitoes at each place, and after painting them turn them loose, and determine from the color of the mosquitoes caught in Gatun from what point they came. I went down there one morning to see how they were caught and painted. Mosquito bars were suspended from limbs tied up at the bottom. They had thousands of mosquitoes in them ready to be sprayed with a colored liquid, and the sanitary inspector was asked how he caught them. He said, 'We have a more scientific way, but this had to be done in a hurry. We simply let the mosquito bar down, as you would open a bed, left one side of it open, and put a Jamaica negro in there for bait.' As soon as the mosquito bar was full the bait was removed and the end tied up. I saw a Jamaica negro standing there. 'John, were you the bait in that bar?' I asked, and he replied, 'Yes, boss; that is the easiest money I ever earned—10 cents an hour for sitting there and doing nothing.'"

DEMOCRATS PICK CONG. HAMMOND

CONFERENCE AT ST PAUL INDORSES ST. JAMES MAN FOR NOMINEE.

LAWLER TO STAY IN RACE

Friends Assert He Will Carry His Fight to State Primaries June 16 —C. M. Andrist Out for Lieut. Governor.

St. Paul.—Congressman Winfield S. Hammond announces that he will heed the request of the Democratic state conference and become a candidate for governor. Charles M. Andrist, of Minneapolis, was indorsed for lieutenant governor.

Voted by Large Majority.

Hammond's indorsement was voted by the conference by an overwhelming vote, after the Lawler delegation from Hennepin had bolted, followed by part of the Ramsey delegation. The convention adopted the credentials committee report seating both the contending delegations from Hennepin, with half a vote each. The Lawler delegation refused to accept the verdict.

Friends of Dan W. Lawler, who is also a candidate for the nomination, bolted the conference and assert that they will carry the fight into the primaries June 16.

The Resolutions.

The resolutions praised the achievements of the national administration, declared opposition to intervention in Mexico, praised Hammond's work in congress, urged support of the initiative and referendum amendment to be submitted to the voters next fall, denounced Governor Eberhart's veto of the Nolan and Minnette bills and his attempt to create a public utilities commission, approved the constitutional amendment for a revolving fund for improvement of state lands, urged legislation for the employment of state convicts on public roads, opposed the use of the injunction in labor disputes and urged submission of a woman suffrage amendment.

The suffrage amendment declaration was later stricken out after a vote had been taken on it.

ORTONVILLE BUILDERS ACTIVE

The Operations This Season Will Surpass Those of Previous Years.

Ortonville.—Building operations in this city this season will surpass those of any of five previous years.

Two new banks have been organized, the Ortonville State bank and the First State bank, and work has commenced on the construction of a modern building to be occupied by the former. The organization of the two gives this city four financial institutions.

The contract for the sewerage system was let a short time ago and the work is being pushed to completion.

The plans for a $10,000 Carnegie library were submitted and arrangements are being made for its construction.

A splendid private hotel, more especially for summer patronage, is being built on the lake front by Clarke Orton.

Fred Pleuger & Son have about completed the work of remodeling the creamery. At least fifteen dwelling houses will be erected.

SMALL BOYS TURN BANDITS

Rob Albert Lea Store and Are Captured—Sentence Is Suspended.

Albert Lea.—The persons who robbed the Albert Lea Hardware company of nearly $60 in merchandise and $14.35 in silver have been located. The robbers proved to be two schoolboys, aged 11 and 14 years.

They went into the store just before closing time and secreted themselves under a counter until all employees had gone. Crawling out they robbed the cash register, gathered in what merchandise they wanted and made their escape. The boys, who were posing as "Diamond Dick" bandits, were arraigned before Judge Hammond, but promising to go to school regularly and furnish Chief of Police Sullivan with a written report each week for six months, their sentence of six months in the county jail was suspended.

Owatonna's Chief Resigns.

Owatonna.—G. G. Morehouse, who was selected mayor when the saloons were voted out, appointed L. F. Fenner chief of police. However, the new chief resigned on Monday following a so-called mass meeting of the temperance faction. A second meeting was called, but was cancelled after Fenner's resignation, which was accepted by the mayor. The recount, which was the outcome of an effort by the liquor faction to make Owatonna a "wet" town again, gave an additional vote for no license.

WILL STUDY HOG CHOLERA

JAMES J. HILL GIVES $50,000 TO FIGHT SWINE DISEASE.

Endowment Pledged to Rockefeller Institute to Swell Million Dollar Fund of Oil King.

St. Paul. — Science will now exert added efforts in its war on hog cholera by use of a $50,000 endowment pledged by James J. Hill to the Rockefeller institute for the study of hog cholera. Announcement of the donation is contained in dispatches from New York which state that Mr. Rockefeller himself has added $1,000,000 to the general fund which will be used exclusively for the investigation of animal diseases.

The endowment will mean a new departure in the field of the institute which has hitherto confined its studies to human diseases and biological sciences.

Mr. Hill's stipulation that his donation be used specifically for the investigation of hog cholera is timely by reason of the fact that the Northwest has suffered an estimated loss of $60,000,000 worth of swine last year because of cholera.

The hope that some similar method of rendering swine immune from cholera may be discovered by use of the Hill donation to Rockefeller institute was expressed by Dr. S. H. Ward, secretary of the state live stock sanitary board.

"The present method of treating hogs against cholera is very cumbersome. It is necessary to inject too much vaccine and this makes the treatment expensive. Also the preparation of the vaccine is cumbersome.

"The endowment by Mr. Hill if the use of it produces some more simplified method of producing vaccine and giving the treatment, will be a boon to the live stock industry of the country.

"Minnesota, with her tremendous loss due to hog cholera, can look with hope to any scientific investigations that promise much needed relief. The endowment by Mr. Hill at least gives this promise."

SHIP CROW WING COUNTY ORE

Nine Hundred Tons Per Day Being Loaded Directly Into Cars.

Brainerd.—The distinction of shipping the first ore from the Cuyuna iron rage in Crow Wing county will fall to the Rogers, Brown Ore company of Armour No. 2 mine near Ironton. Nine hundred tons of ore a day are being loaded directly into the cars.

The Kennedy mine of the Rogers, Brown Ore company at Cuyuna is expected to ship 300,000 tons this season. In the stockpile are 75,000 tons. As the pioneer producer of the range, the Kennedy has always mined and shipped a substantial tonnage each year.

The pit mines are getting active. At the Rowe pit mine at Riverton electrical machinery will be installed within a week. A steam shovel has been working all winter getting the ground in shape. As soon as warm weather comes the hydraulic plant will be placed in operation. The Pennington pit mine west of Ironton, and the Thompson pit mine of the Inland Steel company in Crosby, have steam shovels at work and crews of about 100 men each.

Now that the tonnage of the Cuyuna-Mille Lacs and Cuyuna-Duluth iron mines will be handled by an eastern furnace company, all being associated together in the American Manganese Manufacturing company, these two mines are assured of continuous activity and will do much to create prosperous times on the north range.

State Fair Program Changes.

Hamline.—Several distinct changes in the methods of conducting the speed program at the Minnesota State Fair this fall, supplemented by the usual liberal amount of purses, are certain, in the opinion of the Fair Board, to insure the best racing card ever scheduled on the Hamline track. A total of $26,000 has been hung up by the management, to be divided among twenty harness and six running classes—a prize large enough to attract the best stables in America. Another concession is the new rule by which one-half of the entrance money will be refunded on all starters which finish the race ahead of the flag, but are outside of the money. In this way a fuller field is assured the race horse fan. A special this year is to be the Saddle Horse Stake for a purse of $1,000.

File for State Senate.

St. Paul.—Three new candidates for the state senate filed with the secretary of state last week. W. W. Smith of Sleepy Eye, a banker and member of the republican state committee, filed to succeed Frank Clague in the Brown-Redwood district. Senator Edward Rustad of Wheaton filed to succeed himself in the forty-eighth district, which included Grant, Stevens, Traverse and Big Stone counties. Alfred A. Haagenson of Barnesville, filed in the forty-ninth district, including Clay and Wilkin counties.

MINNEAPOLIS GETS BIG RESERVE BANK

FLOUR CITY IS CHOSEN REGIONAL CENTER FOR DISTRICT NUMBER NINE.

AREA INCLUDES SIX STATES

Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Part of Michigan Make Up Northwest Territory.

Minneapolis.—The Northwest will have a federal reserve bank, located in Minneapolis.

The federal reserve organization board announced its decision to have twelve banks, one of them to be located here.

The Minneapolis District.

The "Minneapolis district," designated as district No. 9, will comprise Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota and parts of Wisconsin and Michigan.

There are in this territory 687 national banks. The capital of the regional institution will be $4,702,864 to start.

This district has an area in square miles of 437,930; the population is 5,724,893.

Boundaries Prove Surprise.

The boundaries of the district proved a surprise. Numerous banks in Wisconsin will be included and all the national banks in northern Michigan.

P. M. Kerst, clearing house examiner for the twin city banks, has the indorsement of both the Minneapolis and St. Paul clearing houses for the position of federal reserve agent, and John H. Rich, Red Wing, is also being mentioned for the appointment as active manager of the bank.

It is thought the first thing the clearing house committee probably will do will be to send out ballots to all national banks in the district for nominations for the three places on the board that are to be filled by practical bankers.

Minneapolis Largest Contributor.

Minneapolis will represent the largest investment in the stock of the bank. The subscription that will be made by local banks under the law requiring that 6 per cent of capital and surplus be put into the stock of the new institution will be $837,000.

Ten men will probably be a sufficient number of employees to start the new Minneapolis reserve bank going and it is considered likely that it will be located in the Minneapolis federal building or in the old post-office. But should the federal reserve board decide to take over the work of collecting checks and of sending out currency to the country, it would mean that 25 to 40 men could be let out of the transit departments of each of the larger Minneapolis banks. In that event the federal reserve bank might shortly become an institution employing 200 to 300 men.

Indian Fighter Is Dead.

St. Paul.—George Laurent, 75 years old, an Indian fighter who came to Minnesota sixty-two years ago, died here of infirmities, due to old age. Laurent styled himself "the last of the Indian fighters." He came to St. Paul with A. L. Larpenteur from St. Louis. The last stage of the journey from Galena was made aboard the old steamer Black Hawk. Unlike Mr. Larpenteur, Laurent followed the frontier West for several years and had a reputation for being one of the most fearless fighters in Colonel Cody's army.

Wealthy Minnesotan Improves.

Los Angeles, Calif., March 30.—Frederick Weyerhaeuser, Minnesota multimillionaire lumberman, ill at his winter home near Pasadena, was prostrated by a severe cold Wednesday. Signs of pneumonia were noted, but his physician reports now that he is much improved. Some anxiety was felt for Mr. Weyerhaeuser on account of his advanced age, until the reassuring report came from the attending physician.

Mankato to Lay Concrete.

Mankato.—At a meeting of the council, the Widell company of this city, of which Governor Eberhart is a member, was awarded the contract for paving fifteen blocks in the residence district with seven-inch concrete. This will be the first of this kind of pavement laid in the city. The Widell company's bid, $1.02 a square yard, was the lowest of half a dozen bids submitted.

Girl Blacks Thug's Eye.

Minneapolis.—A menacing revolver held in the hand of a masked highwayman had no terrors for Miss Rina Flattem and the bold fellow fled under a rain of highly athletic blows. Her answer to his demand for her money was met with a well-directed short-arm jab. There was a desperate struggle for her purse. The robber got it, but it cost him a black eye and he bears other marks by which the police hope to locate him. The purse contained $12, a pair of glasses and keepsakes.

F. WEYERHAEUSER, LUMBERMAN, DIES AT WINTER HOME

END COMES AFTER MILLIONAIRE WAS THOUGHT TO BE OUT OF DANGER—PNEUMONIA WAS AILMENT.

MADE VAST FORTUNE BY BUYING TIMBER LANDS

Started Life As Poor Lad But Early Demonstrated His Shrewd Ability At Recognizing Money-Making Possibilities of Milling Business.

St. Paul, April 6.—Frederick Weyerhaeuser, St. Paul lumberman, one of the wealthiest men in the world, died at his winter home in Pasadena, Cal., after a brief illness from pneumonia. He was 79 years old.

Began As Poor Lad.

Beginning as a poor German immigrant boy to pile slabs in a Rock Island, Ill., sawmill at $1 a day, by industry and wonderful business foresight, Frederick Weyerhaeuser rose to be the dominating figure in the lumber world of the west, and leaves a deep impress on the business life of the Mississippi valley and the Pacific coast.

Dominated Everywhere.

Dominating everywhere, but in every field associating himself with men of capital and brains, Mr. Weyerhaeuser's interests were scattered through a score of states. The various Weyerhaeuser corporations are credited with controlling 30,000,000 acres of timber lands, valued at about $1,500,000,000, but no definite estimate of the Weyerhaeuser fortune has ever been made. Secrecy was a business rule with him, and the extent of his holdings can only be estimated.

Mr. Weyerhaeuser died just as he was thought to be on the road to recovery. Sunday noon Mr. Weyerhaeuser's body was sent aboard a limited train bound for Rock Island, Ill., the old home, for interment beside the body of Mrs. Weyerhaeuser, who died in November, 1911.

Result of Cold.

Mr. Weyerhaeuser caught cold Sunday, March 22, while attending church. On the following Wednesday his condition become so alarming that his children were sent for. Three physicians were called and remained in attendance day and night. They managed to overcome recurrent sinking spells.

His sons, John P., Frederick E., Rudolph M. and Charles A., and his daughters, Mrs. Margaret Jewett, of Chicago; Mrs. W. B. Hill, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Mrs. S. S. Davis, of Rock Island, were at the bedside at the time.

Up to the day that he was taken ill, Mr. Weyerhaeuser had been giving active attention to more important questions connected with his business, but he had relinquished control of the business more and more to his sons and other business associates of late years, and had been spending nearly all his time in Pasadena since the death of Mrs. Weyerhaeuser.

Sons Active in Affairs.

Mr. Weyerhaeuser's four sons all are actively engaged in the business in Minnesota. John P. Weyerhaeuser and Frederick E. Weyerhaeuser, of St. Paul, Charles A. Weyerhaeuser, of Little Falls, and Rudolph M. Weyerhaeuser, of Cloquet, all are interested in the various companies. The headquarters of the syndicate are in St. Paul, but Weyerhaeuser & Co., the corporation under which the offices are maintained in St. Paul, is not a holding company and has no relation directly with any of the numerous manufacturing and timber owning concerns. It is a retail lumber company owning nine yards in as many southern Minnesota towns.

The secret of the Weyerhaeuser fortune, lumbermen say, was in his far-seeing faith in the possibilities of timber lands as an investment. He never paid high prices for timber lands, but bought where there were no logging operations at the time and where the timber could be had for almost nominal prices, holding it patiently until the country developed and a demand arose for it. Then he would, as a rule, build mills and market the lumber. From his earliest operations he bought timber as fast he could raise the capital for it.

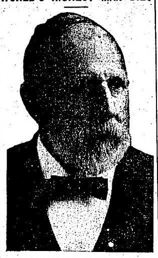
How He Lost Money.

Associates say he once was asked the question: "What do you think of timber lands as an investment?"

"Well," he replied, "I have lost lots of money on timber lands, lots of it, but all the lands I lost money on were lands I didn't buy."

Mr. Weyerhaeuser was proclaimed "richer than Rockefeller" by Charles P. Norcross, a magazine writer, back in 1906 in an article. This article was declared a gross exaggeration, but the size and value of the Weyerhaeuser holdings never has been made public in any way. The Norcross article also contained an appraisal of Weyerhaeuser, the man.

WORLD'S RICHEST MAN DIES



Frederick Weyerhaeuser.

Appraisal of Man.

"As silently and as patiently as one of the giant trees on his land grew to its majestic maturity, Weyerhaeuser has grown," said Mr. Norcross. "He is master of vast reaches and wonderful forests extending from the cluttered drives of Wisconsin lakes and rivers to the Pacific coast. He has behind him fifty years of unremitting toil along lines of telling organization. Patient, shrewd and far-seeing, he has given his life to bringing underneath his dominion the great forest tracts of the northwtst.

"It seems astounding that such an enormous accumulation could be effected without the whole world knowing it; but Weyerhaeuser is a man of mytesry."

In Many Corporations.

Mr. Weyerhaeuser was a heavy owner in the following corporations and, at some time or other, president of nearly all: Mississippi River Boom & Logging Company, Potlatch Lumber Company, Weyerhaeuser Timber Company, Weyerhaeuser Syndicate, Chippewa Lumber & Boom Company, Cloquet Lumber Company, Tacoma Lumber Company, Little Falls Lumber Company, Mississippi River Logging Company, Northland Pine Company, Pine Tree Lumber Company, Musser-Sauntry Company, St. Croix Lumber Company, Shell Lake Lumber Company, Northern Wisconsin Lumber Company, Chippewa Valley Lumber Company, Bonners Ferry Lumber Company, Superior Timber Company, Weyerhaeuser & Denckmann, Weyerhaeuser & Rutledge Lumber Company, Duluth & Northeast Railway, Mesabe Southern Railway, Atwood Lumber Company, Rutledge Lumber Company, Nebagamon Lumber Company.

A Native of Germany.

Frederick Weyerhaeuser was born at Nieder-Saulheim, on the German Rhine, Nov. 21, 1834. His father was a thrifty German farmer, owning 15 acres of land. There were 11 children, but only Frederick and four sisters lived to maturity.

He was a member of the Presbyterian church.

Surviving Convict Explains.

Sacramento, Cal., April 7.—Percy Barnes, the only survivor of the five convicts who battered their way from their cells into Folsom prison Saturday, only to fall before a rain of bullets from the guards, declares that he and his comrades were not trying to escape. Barnes declares that the only object of the 12 "incorrigibles" in the plot was to create a disturbance that would result in their being taken back to the dungeon. Barnes is expected to recover.

TOLLS VOTE IN THREE WEEKS

Exemption Repeal Bill Cannot Be Disposed of in Shorter Period of Time.

Washington, April 7.—With the scene of activity on the issue of Panama toll exemption repeal shifted to the senate after the triumph of the administration in the house last week, plans still remain in the formative stage for the final struggle in the great controversy.

Leaders in the fight do not expect speeches to change any votes, but that there will be a flood of oratorical effort which will far exceed in length and intensity the 20-hour debate on the bill in the house.

No one in close touch with the situation will predict how long the controversy in the senate will continue, but the most optimistic proponents of repeal do not look for a vote for three weeks. The repeal bill and attendant measures will be in committee at least a week and general debate cannot begin until some sort of a report is made or a motion is offered to discharge the committee from further consideration of the bill.

Wilson-McAdoo Wedding Soon.

Washington, April 7.—The wedding of Miss Eleanor Wilson and Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo will take place in April, according to friends of Miss Wilson, although the White House still declines to indicate any date.

Dynamiters Are to Petition.

Chicago, April 7.—A movement seeking a pardon for the members of the structural bridge and iron workers', convicted at Indianapolis of illegally transporting dynamite in interstate commerce, has been begun here. Petitions to President Wilson, charging that the men were rushed through their trials, were circulated at the meeting of the Chicago Federation of Labor. The petitions will be submitted by the delegates to their local unions for signatures,

Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and it has done me a lot of good. I will recommend your medicine to my friends and give you permission to publish my testimonial." — Mrs. LAWRENCE MARTIN, 12 King St., Westbrook, Maine.

Manston, Wis. — "At the Change of Life I suffered with pains in my back and loins until I could not stand. I also had night-sweats so that the sheets would be wet. I tried other medicine but got no relief. After taking one bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound I began to improve and I continued its use for six months. The pains left me, the night-sweats and hot flashes grew less, and in one year I was a different woman. I know I have to thank you for my continued good health ever since." — Mrs. M. J. RAPID LIFE IN WINDY CITY

According to New York Woman's Story Its Reputation Has Basis Other Than Humorous.

There is a New York woman who goes twice a year to Chicago with her husband, when the latter makes periodical business trips. They always stay at the same hotel—a large though quiet house, which gets a good deal of Chicago and Illinois trade. The New Yorkers have come to be known to the woman housekeeper of the hotel. They have just returned from their latest journey to the city by Lake Michigan, and this is what Mrs. New Yorker says:

"I always used to think that the humorous paragraphs in the papers dealing with the frequency of Chicago divorces were jokes, but I know now they have a solid basis of fact. The reason? Because when we were in Chicago this time the housekeeper of the hotel said to me: 'I'm so glad to see you back again, ma'am. And you know—if you'll excuse me saying it—you're the only lady that comes back here year after year with the same husband.' "—New York Times.

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in Burton's inn near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city to identify the body. Wrandall, it appears, had led a gay life and neglected his wife.

CHAPTER I—Continued.

"I'm not so sure of it," said the coroner, shaking his head. "I have a feeling that she isn't one of the ordinary type. It wouldn't surprise me if she belongs to—well, you might say the upper ten. Somebody's wife, don't you see. That will make it rather difficult, especially as her tracks have been pretty well covered."

"It beats me, how she got away without leaving a single sign behind her," acknowledged the sheriff. "She's a wonder, that's all I've got to say."

At that instant the door opened and Mrs. Wrandall appeared. She stopped short, confronting the huddled group, dry-eyed but as pallid as a ghost. Her eyes were wide, apparently unseeing; her colorless lips were parted in the drawn rigidity that suggested but one thing to the professional man who looks: the "risis sardonicus" of the strychnae victim. With a low cry, the doctor started forward, fully convinced that she had swallowed the deadly drug.

"For God's sake, madam," he began. But as he spoke her expression changed; she seemed to be aware of their presence for the first time. Her eyes narrowed in a curious manner, and the rigid lips seemed to surge with blood, presenting the effect of a queer, swift-fading smile that lingered long after her face was set and serious.

"I neglected to raise the window, Dr. Sheef," she said in a low voice. "It was very cold in there." She shivered slightly. "Will you be so kind as to tell me what I am to do now? What formalities remain for me—"

The coroner was at her side. "Time enough for that, Mrs. Wrandall. The first thing you are to do is to take something warm to drink, and pull yourself together a bit—"

She drew herself up coldly. "I am quite myself, Dr. Sheef. Pray do not alarm yourself on my account. I shall be obliged to you, however, if you will tell me what I am to do as speedily as possible, and let me do it so that I may leave this—this unhappy place without delay. No! I mean it, sir. I am going tonight—unless, of course," she said, with a quick look at the sheriff, "the law stands in the way."

"You are at liberty to come and go as you please, Mrs. Wrandall," said the sheriff, "but it is most foolhardy to think of—"

"Thank you, Mr. Sheriff," she said, "for letting me go. I thought perhaps there might be legal restraint." She sent a swift glance over her shoulder, and then spoke in a high, shrill voice, indicative of extreme dread and uneasiness:

"Close the door to that room!"

The door was standing wide open, just as she had left it. Startled, the coroner's deputy sprang forward to close it. Involuntarily, all of her listeners looked in the direction of the room, as if expecting to see the form of the murdered man advancing upon them. The feeling, swiftly gone, was most uncanny.

"Close it from the inside," commanded the coroner, with unmistakable emphasis. The man hesitated, and then did as he was ordered, but not without a curious look at the wife of the dead man, whose back was toward him.

"He will not find anything disturbed, doctor," said she, divining his thought. "I had the feeling that something was creeping toward us out of that room."

"You have every reason to be nervous, madam. The situation has been most extraordinary—most trying," said the coroner. "I beg of you to come downstairs, where we may attend to a few necessary details without delay. It has been a most fatiguing matter for all of us. Hours without sleep, and such wretched weather."

They descended to the warm little reception room. She sent at once for the inn keeper, who came in and glowered at her as if she were wholly responsible for the blight that had been put upon his place.

"Will you be good enough to send some one to the station with me in your depot wagon?" she demanded without hesitation.

He stared. "We don't run a 'bus in the winter time," he said, gruffly.

She opened the little chatelaine bag that hung from her wrist and abstracted a card which she submitted to the coroner.

"You will find, Doctor Sheef, that the car my husband came up here in belongs to me. This is the card issued by the state. It is in my name. The factory number is there. You may compare it with the one on the car. My husband took the car without obtaining my consent."

"Joy riding," said Burton, with an ugly laugh. Then he quailed before the look she gave him.

"If no other means is offered, Doctor Sheef, I shall ask you to let me take the car. I am perfectly capable of driving. I have driven it in the country for two seasons. All I ask is that some one be directed to go with me to the station. No! Better than that, if there is some one here who is willing to accompany me to the city, he shall be handsomely paid for going. It is but little more than 30 miles. I refuse to spend the night in this house. That is final."

They drew apart to confer, leaving her sitting before the fire, a stark figure that seemed to detach itself entirely from its surroundings and their companionship. At last the coroner came to her side and touched her arm.

"I don't know what the district attorney and the police will say to it, Mrs. Wrandall, but I shall take it upon myself to deliver the car to you. The sheriff has gone out to compare the numbers. If he finds that the car is yours, he will see to it, with Mr. Drake, that it is made ready for you. I take it that we will have no difficulty in—" He hesitated, at a loss for words.

"In finding it again in case you need it for evidence?" she supplied. He nodded. "I shall make it a point, Doctor Sheef, to present the car to the state after it has served my purpose tonight. I shall not ride in it again."

"The sheriff has a man who will ride with you to the station or the city, whichever you may elect. Now, may I trouble you to make answer to certain questions I shall write out for you at once? The man is Challis Wrandall, your husband? You are positive?"

"I am positive. He is—or was—Challis Wrandall."

Half an hour later she was ready for the trip to New York city. The clock in the office marked the hour as one. A toddied individual in a great buffalo coat waited for her outside, hiccoughing and bandying jest with the half-frozen men who had spent the night with him in the forlorn hope of finding the girl.

Mrs. Wrandall gave final instructions to the coroner and his deputy, who happened to be the undertaker's assistant. She had answered all the questions that had been put to her, and had signed the document with a firm, untrembling hand. Her veil had been lowered since the beginning of the examination. They did not see her face; they only heard the calm, low voice, sweet with fatigue and dread.

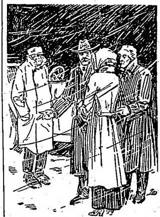
"I shall notify my brother-in-law as soon as I reach the city," she said. "He will attend to everything. Mr. Leslie Wrandall, I mean. My husband's only brother. He will be here in the morning, Doctor Sheef. My own apartment is not open. I have been staying in a hotel since my return from Europe two days ago. But I shall attend to the opening of the place tomorrow. You will find me there."

The coroner hesitated a moment before putting the question that had come to his mind as she spoke.

"Two days ago, madam? May I inquire where your husband has been living during your absence abroad? When did you last see him alive?"

She did not reply for many seconds, and then it was with a perceptible effort.

"I have not seen him since my return until—tonight," she replied, a hoarse note creeping into her voice. "He did not meet me on my return. His brother Leslie came to the dock. He—he said that Challis, who came back from Europe two weeks ahead of me, had been called to St. Louis on very important business. My husband had been living at his club, I understand. That is all I can tell you, sir."



"This Man Will Go With You, Madam," Said the Sheriff.

"I see," said the coroner, gently.

He opened the door for her and she passed out. A number of men were grouped about the throbbing motor car. They fell away as she approached, silently fading into the shadows like so many vast, unwholesome ghosts. The sheriff and Drake came forward.

"This man will go with you, madam," said the sheriff, pointing to an unsteady figure beside the machine. "He is the only one who will undertake it. They're all played out, you see. He has been drinking, but only on account of the hardships he has undergone tonight. You will be quite safe with Morley."

No snow was falling, but a bleak wind blew meanly. The air was free from particles of sleet; wetly the fall of the night clung to the earth where it had fallen.

"If he will guide me to the Post-road, that is all I ask," said she hurriedly. Involuntarily she glanced upward. The curtains in an upstairs window were blowing inward and a dim light shone out upon the roof of the porch. She shuddered and then climbed up to the seat and took her place at the wheel.

A few moments later the three men standing in the middle of the road watched the car as it rushed away.

"By George, she's a wonder!" said the sheriff.

CHAPTER II.

The Passing of a Night.

The sheriff was right. Sara Wrandall was an extraordinary woman, if I may be permitted to modify his rather crude estimate of her. It is difficult to understand, much less describe a nature like hers. Fine-minded, gently bred women who can go through an ordeal such as she experienced without breaking under the strain are rare indeed. They must be wonderful. It is hard to imagine a more heart-breaking crisis in life than the one which confronted her on this dreadful night, and yet she faced it with a fortitude that seems almost unholy.

She had loved her handsome, wayward husband. He had hurt her deeply more times than she chose to remember during the six years of their married life, but she had loved him in spite of the wounds up to the instant when she stood beside his dead body in the cold little room at Burton's inn. She went there loving him as he had lived, yet prepared, almost foresworn to loathe him as he had died, and she left him lying there alone in that dreary room without a spark of the old affection in her soul. Her love for him died in giving birth to the hatred that now possessed her. While he lived it was not in her power to control the unreasoning, resistless thing that stands for love in woman; he was her lover, the master of her impulses. Dead, he was an unwholesome, unlovely clod, a pallid thing to be scorned, a hulk of worthless clay. His blood was cold. He could no longer warm her with it; it could no longer kill the chill that his misdeeds cast about her tender sensitiveness; his lips and eyes never more could smile and conquer. He was a dead thing. Her love was a dead thing. They lay separate and apart. The tie was broken. With love died the final spark of respect she had left for him in her tired, loyal, betrayed heart. He was at last a thing to be despised, even by her. She despised him.

She sent the car down the slope and across the moonless valley with small regard for her own or her companion's safety. It swerved from side to side, skidded and leaped with terrifying suddenness, but held its way as straight as the bird that flies, driven by a steady hand and a mind that had no thought for peril. A sober man at her side would have been afraid; this man swayed mildly to and fro and chuckled with drunken glee.

Her bitter thoughts were not of the dead man back there, but of the live years that she was to bury with him; years that would never pass beyond her ken, that would never die. He had loved her in his wild, ruthless way. He had left her times without number in the years gone by, but he had always come back, gaily unchastened, to remold the love that waited with dog-like fidelity for the touch of his cunning hand. But he had taken his last flight. He would not come back again. It was all over. Once too often he had tried his reckless wings. She would not have to forgive him again. Uppermost in her mind was the curiously restful thought that his troubles were over, and with them her own. A hand less forgiving than hers had struck him dead.

Somehow, she envied the woman to whom that hand belonged. It had been her divine right to kill, and yet another took it from her.

Back there at the inn she had said to the astonished sheriff:

"Poor thing, if she can escape punishment for this, let it be so. I shall not help the law to kill her simply because she took it in her own hands to pay that man what she owed him. I shall not be the one to say that he did not deserve death at her hands, whoever she may be. No, I shall offer no reward. If you catch her, I shall be sorry for her, Mr. Sheriff. Believe me, I bear her no grudge."

"But she robbed him," the sheriff had cried.

"From my point of view, Mr. Sheriff, that hasn't anything to do with the case," was her significant reply.

"Of course, I am not defending him."

"Nor am I defending her," she had retorted. "It would appear that she is able to defend herself."

Now, on the cold, trackless road, she was saying to herself that she did have a grudge against the woman who had destroyed the life that belonged to her, who had killed the thing that was hers to kill. She could not mourn for him. She could only wonder what the poor, hunted, terrified creature would do when taken and made to pay for the thing she had done.

Once, in the course of her bitter reflections, she spoke aloud in a shrill, tense voice, forgetful of the presence of the man beside her:

"Thank God they will see him now as I have seen him all these years. They will know him as they have never known him. Thank God for that!"

The man looked at her stupidly and muttered something under his breath. She heard him, and recalling her wits, asked which turn she was to take for the station. The fellow lopped back in the seat, too drunk to reply.

For a moment she was dismayed, frightened. Then she resolutely reached out and shook him by the shoulder. She had brought the car to a full stop.

"Arouse yourself, man!" she cried. "Do you want to freeze to death? Where is the station?"

He straightened up with an effort, and, after vainly seeking light in the darkness, fell back again with a grunt, but managed to wave his hand toward the left. She took the chance. In five minutes she brought the car to a standstill beside the station. Through the window she saw a man with his feet cocked high, reading. He leaped to his feet in amazement as she entered the waiting-room.

"Are you the agent?" she demanded.

"No, ma'am. I'm simply staying here for the sheriff. We're looking for a woman—say!" He stopped short and stared at the veiled face with wide, excited eyes. "Gee whiz! Maybe you—"

"No, I am not the woman you want. Do you know anything about the trains?"

"I guess I'll telephone to the sheriff before I—"

"If you will step outside you will find one of the sheriff's deputies in my automobile, helplessly intoxicated. I am Mrs. Wrandall."

"Oh," he gasped. "I heard 'em say you were coming up tonight. Well, say! What do you think of—"

"In there a train in before morning?"

"No, ma'am. Seven-forty is the first."

She waited a moment. "Then I shall have to ask you to come out and get your fellow-deputy. He is useless to me. I mean to go on in the machine. The sheriff understands."

The fellow hesitated.

"I cannot take him with me, and he will freeze to death if I leave him in the road. Will you come?"

The man stared at her.

"Say, is it your husband?" he asked agape.

She nodded her head.

"Well, I'll go out and have a look at the fellow you've got with you," he said, still doubtful.

She stood in the door while he crossed over to the car and peered at the face of the sleeper.

"Steve Morley," he said. "Fuller'n a goat."

"Please remove him from the car," she directed.

Later on, as he stood looking down at the inert figure in the big rocking chair, and panting from his labors, he heard her say patiently:

"And now will you be so good as to direct me to the Post-road."

He scratched his head. "This is mighty queer, the whole business," he declared, assailed by doubts. "Suppose you are not Mrs. Wrandall, but—the other one. What then?"

As if in answer to his question, the man Morley opened his blear-eyes and tried to get to his feet.

"What—what are we doin' here, Mis' Wran'all? Wha's up?"

"Stay where you are, Steve," said the other. "It's all right." Then he went forth and pointed the way to her. "It's a long ways to Columbus Circle," he said. "I don't envy you the trip. Keep straight ahead after you hit the Post-road." He stood there listening until the whir of the motor was lost in the distance. "She'll never make it," he said to himself. "It's more than a strong man could do on roads like these. She must be crazy."

Coming to the Post-road, she increased the speed of the car, with the sharp wind behind her, her eyes intent on the white stretch that leaped up in front of the lamps like a blank wall beyond which there was nothing but dense oblivion. But for the fact that she knew that this road ran straight and unobstructed into the outskirts of New York, she might have lost courage and decision. The natural confidence of an experienced driver was hers. She had the daring of one who has never met with an accident, and who trusts to the instincts rather than to an actual understanding of conditions. With her, it was not a question of her own capacity and strength, but a belief in the fidelity of the engine that carried her forward. It had not occurred to her that the task of guiding that heavy, swerving thing through the unbroken road was something beyond her powers of endurance. She often had driven it a hundred miles and more without resting, or without losing zest in the enterprise; then why should she fear the small matter of 30 miles, even under the most trying of conditions?

Sharply there came to her mind the question: was she the only one abroad in this black little world? What of the other woman? The one who was being hunted? Where was she? And what of the ghost at her heels?

The car bounded over a railroad crossing. She recalled the directions given by the man at the station and hastily applied the brake. There was another and more dangerous crossing a hundred yards ahead. She had been warned particularly to take it carefully, as there was a sharp curve in the road beyond.

Suddenly she jammed down the emergency brake, a startled exclamation falling from her lips. Not 20 feet ahead, in the middle of the road and directly in line with the light of the lamps, stood a black, motionless figure—the figure of a woman whose head was lowered and whose arms hung limply at her sides.

The woman in the car bent forward over the wheel, staring hard. Many seconds passed. At last the forlorn object in the roadway lifted her face and looked vacantly into the glare of the lamps. Her eyes were wide-open, her face a ghastly white.

"God in heaven!" struggled from the stiffening lips of Sara Wrandall. Her fingers tightened on the wheel.

She knew. This was the woman!

The long brown ulster; the limp, fluttering veil? "A woman about your size and figure," the sheriff had said.

The figure swayed and then moved a few steps forward. Blinded by the lights, she bent her head and shielded her eyes with her hand the better to glimpse the occupant of the car.

"Are you looking for me?" she cried out shrilly, at the same time spreading her arms as if in surrender. It was almost a wail.

Mrs. Wrandall caught her breath. Her heart began to beat once more.

"Who are you? What do you want?" she cried out, without knowing what she said.

The girl started. She had not expected to hear the voice of a woman. She staggered to the side of the road, out of the line of light.

"I—I beg your pardon," she cried—It was like a wall of disappointment—"I am sorry to have stopped you."

"Come here," commanded the other, still staring.

The unsteady figure advanced. Halting beside the car, she leaned across the spare tires and gazed into the eyes of the driver. Their faces were not more than a foot apart, their eyes were narrowed in tense scrutiny.

"What do you want?" repeated Mrs. Wrandall, her voice hoarse and tremulous.

"I am looking for an inn. It must be near by. I do—"

"An inn?" with a start.

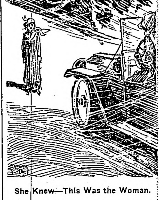
"I do not recall the name. It is not far from a village, in the hills."

"Do you mean Burton's?"

"Yes. That's it. Can you direct me?" The voice of the girl was faint; she seemed about to fall.

"It is six or eight miles from here," said Mrs. Wrandall, still looking in wonder at the miserable night-farer.

The girl's head sank; a moan of despair came through her lips, ending in a sob.



She Knew—This Was the Woman.

"So far as that?" she murmured. Then she drew herself up with a fine show of resolution. "But I must not stop here. Thank you."

"Wait!" cried the other. The girl turned to her once more. "Is—is it a matter of life or death?"

There was a long silence. "Yes. I must find my way there. It is—death."

Sara Wrandall laid her heavily gloved hand on the slim fingers that touched the tire.

"Listen to me," she said, a shrill note of resolve ringing in her voice. "I am going to New York. Won't you let me take you with me?"

The girl drew back, wonder and apprehension struggling for the mastery of her eyes.

"But I am bound the other way. To the inn. I must go on."

"Come with me," said Sara Wrandall firmly. "You must not go back there. I know what has happened there. Come! I will take care of you. You must not go to the inn."

"You know?" faltered the girl.

"Yes. You poor thing!" There was infinite pity in her voice.

The girl laid her head on her arms.

Mrs. Wrandall sat above her, looking down, held mute by warring emotions. The impossible had come to pass. The girl for whom the whole world would be searching in a day or two, had stepped out of the unknown and, by the most whimsical jest of fate, into the custody of the one person most interested of all in that selfsame world. It was unbelievable. She wondered if it were not a dream, or the hallucination of an overwrought mind. Spurred by the sudden doubt as to the reality of the object before her, she stretched out her hand and touched the girl's shoulder.

Instantly she looked up. Her fingers sought the friendly hand and clasped it tightly.

"Oh, if you will only take me to the city with you! If you only give me the chance," she cried hoarsely. "I don't know what impulse was driving me back there. I only know I could not help myself. You really mean it? You will take me with you?"

"Yes. Don't be afraid. Come! Get in," said the woman in the car rapidly. "You—you are real?"

The girl did not hear the strange question. She was hurrying around to the opposite side of the car. As she crossed before the lamps, Mrs. Wrandall noticed with dulled interest that her garments were covered with mud; her small, comely hat was in sad disorder; loose wisps of hair fluttered with the unsightly veil. Her hands, she recalled, were clad in thin suede gloves. She would be half-frozen. She had been out in all this terrible weather—perhaps since the hour of her flight from the inn.

The odd feeling of pity grew stronger within her. She made no effort to analyze it, nor to account for it. Why should she pity the slayer of her husband? It was a question unasked, unconsidered. Afterwards she was to recall this hour and its strange impulses, and to realize that it was not pity, but mercy that moved her to do the extraordinary thing that followed.

Trembling all over, her teeth chattering, her breath coming in short little moans, the girl struggled up beside her and fell back in the seat. Without a word, Sara Wrandall drew the great buffalo robe over her and tucked it in about her feet and legs far up about her body, which had slumped down in the seat.

"You are very, very good," chattered the girl, almost inaudibly. "I shall never forget—" She did not complete the sentence, but sat upright and fixed her gaze on her companion's face. "You—you are not doing this just to turn me over to—to the police? They must be searching for me. You are not going to give me up to them, are you? There will be a reward I—"

"There is no reward," said Sara Wrandall sharply. "I do not mean to give you up. I am simply giving you a chance to get away. I have always felt sorry for the fox when the time for the kill drew near. That's the way I feel."

"Oh, thank you! Thank you! But what am I saying? Why should I permit you to do this for me? I meant to go back there and have it over with. I know I can't escape. It will have to come, it is bound to come. Why put it off? Let them take me, let them do what they will with me. I—"

"Hush! We'll see. First of all, understand me: I shall not turn you over to the police. I will give you the chance. I will help you. I can do no more than that."

"But why should you help me? I—I—oh, I can't let you do it! You do not understand. I—have—committed—a—terrible—" she broke off with a groan.

"I understand," said the other, something like grimness in her level tones. "I have been tempted more than once myself." The enigmatic remark made no impression on the listener.

"I wonder how long ago it was that it all happened," muttered the girl, as if to herself. "It seems ages—oh, such ages."

"Where have you been hiding since last night?" asked Mrs. Wrandall, throwing in the clutch. The car started forward with a jerk, kicking up the snow behind it.

"Was it only last night? Oh, I've been—" The thought of her sufferings from exposure and dread was too much for the wretched creature. She broke out in a soft wail.

"You've been out in all this weather?" demanded the other.

"I lost my way. In the hills back there. I don't know where I was."

"Had you no place of shelter?"

"Where could I seek shelter? I spent the day in the cellar of a farmer's house. He didn't know I was there. I have had no food."

"Why did you kill that man?"

It took a New York millionaire to hit upon the best scheme yet for cutting down household expenses if one must wed; he married a fashionable milliner.—Baltimore News.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879

A MOVE IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION.

That Democratic conference held at St. Paul adopted one plank in their platform which will strike a popular chord in this state. Read this, you over burdened tax payers: "We pledge ourselves to stop this needless and extravagant dissipation of the people's money by the abolition of useless and cumbersome boards and commissions, and systematizing the business of the state to the end of that state business be conducted efficiently and economically."

The above has the true ring and is the first good news we have heard from any candidate or party. But that is just the kind of medicine that the tax payers of this state want dished up in good large chunks.

Every legislature of this state for the past number of years have been passing acts creating needless commissions and boards, to make room for more politicians to be fed at the public crib at the expense of the tax payers until the people are waking up to the fact that it is time to call a halt.

Another good plank put into the platform, which will appeal to old line populists is:

"We reaffirm our allegiance to the principle of the direct legislation and call attention of all voters to the fact that at the coming election a proposed amendment to the state Constitution providing for the initiative and referendum will be submitted and we urge its support."

The conference indorsed Congressman Winfield S. Hammond, as the party candidate for governor, and we believe that the party have chosen a man who will if elected carry out the views as expressed by the conference, which is certainly the first ray of hope for a change for the better in this state.

Congressmen Stevens, Davis, Anderson, Miller, Lindberg, Steenerson and Volstad, voted for the repeal of the Tolls Bill through the Panama Canal, as requested by President Wilson, and they certainly did right and are justly entitled to the thanks of their constituants. We were quite sure that Congressman Steenerson would vote just as he did on this question as it is a slap at his old enemy ship subsidies.

Dan Lawler will continue to run as democratic nominee for governor, but where can he expect to get any support? He is not a democrat only when he wants office, and the party will not support him, and we opinion that his candidacy will be like a morning mist that will vanish with the noon day sun,

H, O. Kjomme has announced himself as a candidate for county attorney of Pennington County and we believe he is a good man for the position and hope to see him duly elected next November.

The new bank that is to be put in at Highlanding will be of immense benefit to the improvement and building up of this part of the country. The next thing to capital, to build up and improve a new country is credit, and a strong financial bank that is located in the territory are in better condition to extend credit to a farmer who needs it than one that is located at a distance, as they are on the ground and can look over the security that is offered them for the return of their money with interest. There is no use to deny the fact, that there is always a class of men in every locality who are likely to reach out too far into the credit column, and when the pay day comes are not able to meet their obligations, which naturally hurts the credit of the locality in which they reside, if all are doing business with banks located a distane from them. This is a condition that a local bank can remedy, by extending credit where credit is due, and sorting out the ones who will get all the credit possible without making calculations to pay their obligations.

Political Announcement

Inserted by C. L. Hanson and paid for by him at regular advertising rates.

Having been urgently requested by many friends to become a candidate for the State Senate. I have decided to comply with their requests, and offer myself for that important position.

I respectfully solicit the support of the voters of Clearwater, Red Lake and Pennington Counties, at the primary election to be held June 16th, 1814, and if nominated and elected, I pledge my best efforts to the honest and efficient service of the people of my District and State.

I hereby submit my platform for your consideration and approval

I advocate and if elected will support:

Legislation for greater state aid for roads and bridges.

Legislative provision for development of state lands by the state.

Any legislation that will help compel proper business-like economy and increase the efficiency of administration of the State's business affairs.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Corporations, in my opinion should be regulated so as to insure to the public the best possible service in every instance, and should be permitted reasonable returns only, for service rendered.

I am unalterably opposed to "Boss Rules" in politics.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the people in State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of conditions in the rural communities.

Yours very truly,
C. L. HANSON,
Thief River Falls, Minn.

Inserted by G. P. Jones and paid for by him at regular advertiesing rates.

To the voters of Sixty Fifth Dist., composed of the Counties of Pennington, Clearwater and Red Lake, Having recently filed as a candidate for Representative for this district, I herewith announce my Candidacy through the public press.

In soliciting your support and votes at the coming Primary Election to be held, June 16th, 1914, I deem, it incumbent upon me, under the present non-parisan Primary, to submit a platform for your consideration covering the most important issues now before the people of this state and district.

If nominated and elected I pledge to use my best efforts and ability, to work for the following legislation.

Legislation for economy and efficiency in the state Administration of business affairs, for the purpose of lightening the burden of the present high taxes.

Legislation for increasing the efficiency of our present Road Law. known as the "Dunn Good Road Law."

Legislation that will prevent discrimination in the enforcement of our tax levies.

Also I will favor legislation giving both sexes an equal franchise,

I shall encourage the adoption of the Revolving Fund Amendment, known as House File No. 1242. Also the Initative Referendum Amendment.

Realizing thet the people in the Sixty Fifth Dist. are dependent upon the Agricultural products of the soil, and her wealth must come there from, I shall favor all legislation that will tend to benefit rural communities especially the farmers and laborers.

I am opposed to "Boss" rule, Boss-rulers, are political "Yeggmen," robbing the voters our of their inherent rights of a free ballot debarring them from a free choice of their Legislators; —therefore, I favor our present Non-Partisan Primary Law and will support all legislation that will tend to make our primary law more efficient. I am opposed to the centralization of the power of Government but firmly believe in the rule of the people in governing all their local and domestic affairs.

If nominated and elected I shall support every measure that will tend to increase the power of the people in local and state government and all measures that will tend to build up the social conditions of our rural communities.

Signed, G. P. JONES,
Bagley, Minn.

The farmers who are expecting to stay and make their future home on their farms can not better invest a few dollars than to buy a small stock of fruit trees, and small fruit shrubbery such as currants, gooseberries and raspberries, as it will only be a few years before they will get rich returns from the amount of their investment.

The trouble with O'Neill is, that he cannot deny how he voted as we have his record in black and white. Of course we are a common farmer, raising corn and hogs, but we occasionally raise a little h--l with them ducks that we elect to represent us, if they don't vote right, and when the farmers of this district send a man down to St. Paul to represent them, and he votes for the interest of the cities, we propose to tell the farmers about it, and give them the date and the official record of his vote. See if we don't.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

SPRING FEVER IS HEALTHY

It Indicates Fresh Hopes and Renewed Buoyancy of Spirit.

How wonderfully tight the spring wander-lust for the countryside grips one!

Spring fever, with all of its healthfulness, is the harbinger of fresh hopes and a buoyancy of spirit.

I noticed a passenger on a Detroit-Chicago train the other day who had started out on his trip with the evident intention of becoming deeply taken with one of the best sellers, that he might shorten the trip between the two cities. You have done the same thing yourself.

But his book had been cast aside. He had read only a few pages. His interest in it had lagged.

From the car windows he was counting the fields now bared of snow. The ditches were carrying away the water and the still less sluggish creeks were now streams bearing the overflow to the rivers. The farmer, in his shirt sleeves, was repairing the fences after the winter drifts; the cattle showing proof of a winter's stabling and now heading here and there toward the meadows, seeking the new-green patches of grass; the farm help, in field and stubble, was putting into repair this and that necessary feature, here looking after his plow and there his harrow, and on all sides were scenes which reminded the traveler that spring was here, at last!

As the train sped onward and glimpses of the painter as he worked on the weather-beaten buildings were revealed, the interest of the tourist was aroused and, when I asked him the reason, he answered: "Spring is here and I feel its blood flowing!"

The truth was, that like many others, he was planning the work he was to do the coming summer. He was going out to the farm—his farm in Western Canada. He had his wells to dig, his horses to get into shape, his grain implements to fix up, his seed grain to prepare, and other details for the land that was ready to receive it. His was what might be termed an "unrest"—to get to the farm!

Thousands in Western Canada today are making the preparations that this interested man contemplated. Their summer fallows are ready for the wheat, their spring plowing is being attended to, fences are being rebuilt or being put into repair; indeed, the entire country is one great hive of industry.

Railroads are in readiness to take care of a great rush of settlers, those charged with the reception of whom are prepared to extend every courtesy and thus meet the rush with judgment and without the least friction. Thus, the enjoyment of the opening of spring is fully met.

At many of the stations throughout many of the middle western states, trains of settlers' effects are in readiness to move to Western Canada. Not only in these states are scenes of this kind to be witnessed, but, also, on either coast and throughout the eastern states there is the same activity among those going to Western Canada this spring. The crops have been heavy and all reports are that the winter was enjoyable; also, that the prospects for a satisfactory year were never better. There is plenty of land yet to be had by homesteading or otherwise. Adapted, as Western Canada is, to small grain farming, it is especially adapted to cattle raising and many of the farmers are placing small and large herds, as their individual means will permit.

The illustrated literature sent out by the Canadian government agents tells the truth clearly and the inquirer should send for a copy and if you be one of those who has an ambitious interest, you may be the gainer by a perusal of such information—straight, cold facts in themselves.—Advertisement.

Parks—No. To me the tragedy of Napoleon may be summed up in two lines. The divorce of Josephine was the prelude; Elba the interlude, and his last battle the Waterlooed.

RASH ITCHED AND BURNED

It was a small rash or pimples and it itched and burned, especially at night, so that before I knew it I had made myself sore. "I had this trouble and took treatments for about one year, but they only gave me relief while taking them. Then I began using Cuticura Soap and Ointment and I got relief right away. In three months I was a well man again." (Signed) H. W. Foley, Nov. 5, 1912.

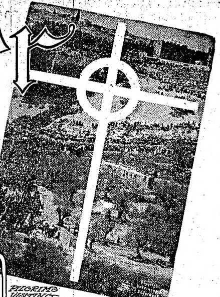
Easter in Many Lands

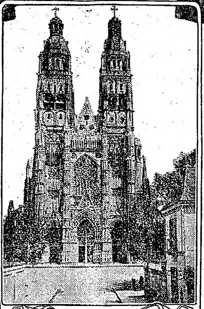
STRUGGLING TO REACH THE HOLY FIRE – HOLY SEPULCHRE CHURCH



PILGRIMS VISITING SACRED SITES OUTSIDE JERUSALEM

EASTER in foreign lands is the gala day of the year and is celebrated with a zest rarely found in this country, where the chief features of the occasion are choral services and Dame Fashion's parade of Easter finery. Easter festivities abroad are elaborate in the extreme and marked by many unique customs and ceremonies.

During Holy week no meat is eaten in Poland. Good Friday, dressed in mourning, the women go to church and pray for an hour. The grave of Christ is always represented at the church, and it is before this prayers are said. Saturday, too, is spent in fasting and prayer. Easter Sunday the great luncheon, or "swieceny," as it is called in Polish, takes place. At the castles of the nobility refreshments are prepared for hundreds of guests. The tables are laden with cold meats, pigs roasted whole, various kinds of sausages and great cakes, or "haba," which are always eaten at Eastertide. During the afternoon visitors call. It is the custom of the host and hostess to meet their guests at the door with a plate of eggs, each visitor takes a small piece and the greeting of the day, "Hallelujah," is exchanged.



CATHEDRAL of TOURS France

EASTER SUNDAY AMONG THE ARMENIANS

RUSSIAN EASTER – KISSING THE IKONS

On the day preceding this luncheon the food is blessed by the priest. As the castle is usually the center of the community, the peasants or farmers bring their food there. When the priest blesses the castle luncheon he also bestows a blessing upon the food of the servants and peasants in the lower hall. During the entire week following Easter Sunday visitors are invited to partake of the cold dishes on the Easter luncheon table, which is replenished as necessity arises.

Landowners receive gifts from the peasants on their estates at Eastertide. One may bring his best calf, another his fattest pig, and a woman her largest chicken or duck. In turn the peasants receive presents of money and other valuables.

The children play with eggs on Easter Sunday in much the same manner they do on the White House lawn in Washington. In Austria-Hungary the same ceremony is observed, with the exception of the great luncheon. Always on Good Friday the emperor and his court attend divine service for an hour.

Easter in France is primarily a floral celebration. The flower market along the Seine is redolent with the perfume of lilies and other as fragrant, though less stately blooms. Every one wears a flower at Eastertide, and poor indeed is the household that does not display a floral symbol of "the resurrection and the life."

It is not one of the great celebrations of France, but is decidedly a children's day. Of course, it is a legal holiday and the banks, government buildings and schools are closed. There are the usual religious services to be found in a Catholic country. The Parisian child makes merry with Easter eggs, which are generally painted in vivid colors. For the children of the wealthier class are eggs of chocolate and sugar, either solid candy or hollowed out so as to conceal pretty favors in the form of small toys.

In Italy, Easter is quite the most important religious festival of the year and a time of public and private rejoicing. In Rome on Easter Sunday and for several days afterward religious processions are to be seen on the streets. Dignitaries of the church, clad in gorgeous raiment, march from church to church, blessing the baptismal fonts and rekindling the altar fires that were extinguished on Good Friday in memory of the death of Christ.

A unique ceremony marks the observance of Holy week in Florence, Italy. It is probable this ceremony will be discontinued before many years because of the fatalities and serious accidents which have occured in recent years.

At noon on Saturday of Holy week a ceremony called the "scoppio del carro" (the explosion of the car) takes place in the Piazzo del Duomo, just in front of the Battistero. It is in fulfillment of a provision in the will of the de Pazzi family, an ancient Florentine household, certain members of which brought flints from the holy land with which to kindle the fires on the altars at Easter.

The "car," which resembles an altar and is nearly as large as a small frame house, is drawn to the square before the cathedral by a team of white oxen, where it is filled with fireworks and decorated with flowers. A wire is stretched from the car to the altar in the cathedral. At the conclusion of the service a wooden device known as a "dove," traveling over the wire on a wheel and bearing a small fuse, is lighted from the sacred fire on the alter. It rushes down the wire to the car filled with combustibles. The explosion that follows is a wonderful pyrotechnic display. The peasants in and near Florence attach considerable importance to the explosion of the "car," and especially to the uninterrupted descent of the "dove" down the wire; if everything transpires without a hitch, they consider it an omen of plentiful crops the rest of the year.

Abounding in quaint customs and strange ceremonies Mexico upholds her reputation in her Easter celebration. The day is a day of vengeance—not upon the living, but upon the numberless images of Judas Iscariot, the betrayer of Christ. All over the country countless images of Judas are made, generally in peasant clothes, with ropes fastened around their necks. Amid the hoots and jeers of the crowd the images are swung aloft and hung. As they swing to and fro stones and knives are hurled at them; out in the provinces the figures are riddled with bullets until they are literally cut to ribbons. Sometimes an image is stuffed with cigarettes, confections and trinkets, strung aloft and exploded from a fuse running to the ground. The contents are scattered in the explosion, of course, and the grown-ups as well as the children scramble for the flying gifts.

The ceremonies really begin with Thursday evening of Holy week, when the "visita de la siete casas," or the calling of the seven houses or churches, is held. The populace on this occasion visit seven or more churches—there must be seven at the lowest—and pray. All the churches are decorated, and there is considerable rivalry as to which has the most gorgeous altar. On the afternoon of Good Friday there is a service called "la siete palabras," or the seven words, referring to the seven words of Christ on the cross. All women attending this service are dressed either in mourning or in somber colors. In the evening, attired in the same manner, they attend a service called "pesame," a service of condolence and mourning.

On Saturday morning the "gloria" service is held, after which comes the hanging of the effigies of Judas. In the afternoon the people attend the theaters or a bull fight if the weather is not too warm for the latter. On Easter day proper the celebration is almost entirely a religious one.

Easter is the holiday of holidays in Russia. This is partly due to the fact that Easter is the first celebration of the spring season, and the warm weather naturally draws people to the out-of-doors.

On Easter eve in Russia there is a church service held which begins before midnight and continues for half an hour. In the country, even among the peasants where the customs are more strictly followed, the people wear their best and lightest clothes.

After the service comes the Easter kiss. Friends kiss three times, first on one cheek, then on the other, and the last time on the other cheek again. This represents the joy they feel on account of the Savior's resurrection. The custom is sometimes continued for several days, and the peasants often kiss those whom they have just met.

Following the half-hour church service there is a night mass held, the only one during the year. This is not usually ended until 3 o'clock in the morning. From the church the people return home and have what is really an early breakfast, but which is more like a feast. They eat hard-boiled eggs, "pascha" and "coolitch," which form the features of the repast.

The custom of kissing is also observed in the court. Easter day the emperor receives the members of his household, his bodyguard and representatives from the officers and soldiers of the regiments stationed in and near St. Petersburg.

Easter is a joyful occasion for the children. For two or three days previous their elders dye eggs for them, much as is done in this country. Easter the children roll them and play with them. It is also the custom to exchange eggs, and many people carry a few with them to present to their friends after the church service. The children play with their eggs for a week after Easter and sometimes longer. The "pascha" and "coolitch" are also eaten during the week after Easter, and always served to visitors who may call. It is also a custom to greet friends Easter day with "Christ is risen from the dead." To that the friend replies in the same way or exclaims: "Yea, verily, he is risen!"

Another phase of the Russian celebration of Easter is to be found not in Russia, but in Palestine. Thousands upon thousands of pilgrims, from Russia, but also from other parts of the world as well, assemble on the banks of the river Jordan on Easter morning to bathe in the same waters in which Christ was baptized. As the rays of the rising sun gild the tops of the mountains of Moab a shout of "Hosanna" bursts forth with one accord from every throat, followed by song. Baptismal robes are donned and the people rush into the stream. The Russian government has erected hospices for the pilgrims all along their line of march.

Easter in Jerusalem is a great occasion. At the Church of the Holy Sepulchre the ceremony of the descent of the holy fire is celebrated on Saturday. All lights in the church are extinguished at a certain hour and the worshipers stand praying that the holy fire be sent down from heaven. Two high priests go down into the sacred sepulchre; suddenly lights appear in the tomb, and other priests hand down candles, which are returned to them lighted. These candles are then carried to the various churches in the city to light their altar candles, and, in fact, there have been instances wherein they have been carried all the way back to Russia by pilgrims. On Palm Sunday a great service is held in the church, at the conclusion of which the worshipers stream forth shouting "Hosanna!" and waving their palm branches.

The most remarkable feature of the Easter celebration in Jerusalem, however, is the march of the pilgrims through the Via Dolorosa. Many thousands of persons from all over the world participate in this march, following the course taken by Christ in his journey to the cross on Calvary.

Good Friday in Spain, especially in Seville, is the day on which the various guilds and societies and the monks array themselves in fantastic garb and parade the streets as mummers. They bear before them huge standards, crosses, images of the Virgin Mary and queer symbolic devices. In other sections of the country the parade takes the form of a carnival of flowers; queens of the carnival are chosen and they are feted with all the homage usually shown a real sovereign. Vast sums, secured by popular subscription, are expended upon the parades. The images of the virgin are garbed in robes and jewels that cost thousands of dollars.

The beautiful service in St. Mark's cathedral is by far the chief feature of the Easter celebration in Venice. The worshipers come to the church in gondolas literally covered with flowers. The entire scene is a riot of color and blooms. In the afternoon every one bears a supply of food to the square in front of the cathedral and scatters it broadcast to the countless flocks of pigeons that fly about the stately edifice.

on many farms in Western Canada in 1913, some yields being reported as high as 50 bushels per acre. As high as 100 bushels were recorded in some districts for oats, 50 bushels for barley and from 10 to 20 bus. for flax.

J. Keys arrived in the country 5 years ago from Denmark with very little means. He homesteaded, worked hard, is now the owner of 320 acres of land, in 1913 had a crop of 200 acres, which will realize him about $4,000. His wheat weighed 68 lbs. to the bushel and averaged over 35 bushels to the acre.

Thousands of similar instances might be related of the homesteaders in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The crop of 1913 was an abundant one everywhere in Western Canada.

HOPE FOR 173 MEN ABOUT ABANDONED

SEALING STEAMER SOUTHERN CROSS IS TO BE POSTED AS LOST.

STORY OF OTHER TRAGEDY

Survivors of Newfoundland Tell of Death of Comrades—Identification Scenes Are Pitiful.

St. Johns, N. F., April 7.—Hope for the safety of the sealing steamer Southern Cross, missing since last Tuesday's storm, has been practically abandoned, and the vessel is to be officially posted as lost with her crew of 173 men.

Newfoundland Survivors Talk.

The handful of /survivors of the Newfoundland have just told their stories of the disaster which cost the lives of 77 of their comrades, and they hold out no hope that the Southern Cross might have weathered the gale.

The colony, plunged into mourning by the greatest tragedy in its history, has waited in vain, hoping against hope that the wireless search of the sea might bring some word from the missing vessel whose loss would deprive whole settlements of their bread winners and render more than 1,000 women and children dependent upon charity.

First Hopes Fade.

First hopes, based on the stoutness of the ship, faded when survivors of the Newfoundland told of the two days' blizzard and the condition in which it caught the Southern Cross.

Captain Martin said he parted company from her a week ago Thursday, when the Southern Cross turned homeward with 17,000 seals. She was so deeply laden that all her provisions and part of her bunker coal were stored on deck so that every available space below could be filled with her catch.

Captain Bartlett of the Terra Nova said the last he saw of the Southern Cross was a week ago Friday, when she was wallowing slowly down the coast. Other ships of the fleet sighted the steamer driving before the gale last Tuesday morning. She has not been reported since and the skippers of the fleet that came through that gale and the storm of equal severity later in the week, say every chance was against a vessel so deeply laden.

Churches Remember Dead.

In every church Sunday the disaster which overtook the Newfoundland's men on the ice was the theme of the sermon.

Messages of sympathy from the king and from the Canadian premier were read and were gratefully received.

By noon all but five of the 69 bodies of the Newfoundland's hunters, brought in Saturday by the Bellaventure, had been identified. These were shipped on a special train for Bona Vista, where most of the victims lived.

Attendants at the Greenfell institute, which was turned into morgue, said that the scene accompanying the identification of the bodies were almost beyond endurance.

One woman found two bodies clasped so tightly in death they could not be separated. They were her husband and son. The lad was wrapped in his father's arms, as if the man had been trying to sheild him from the pitiless cold.

Pitiful Scenes Enacted.

The hand of another dead man was missing. One of the survivors who had lain helpless near the body for nearly 48 hours, said that his comrade, unable to stand the agony of frostbite, had sliced off the hand with his seaman's knife.

A gray-haired mother, supported by her two daughters, passed down the long rows looking for her sons. Attention was suddenly drawn to them when the woman fell to the floor in a faint. They had found not only the four sons and brothers, but two cousins, among the dead.

Of the 30 survivors in the hospital, none is expected to die, but the majority will never be fit for active service again. Three lost both hands and both feet. Five lost both feet. Eight others lost a foot and 11 will lose a hand or fingers. The others will bear scars for life.

Attica, Ind., April 7.—Three persons were killed and about 35 others injured when the Wabasha passenger train No. 4, known as the Continental Limited, was wrecked when the bridge over the Wabash river, just west of here, gave way. The engine, a baggage car and the day coach dropped into the water. When the cars left the bridge the day coach, which was crowded, fell with the rear end out of the water and though the majority of the injured were in this car, none was killed.

Wisest Nation.

"It says here, 'One of the idols most revered by the Koreans is the figure of a woman, seated, resting her chin in her hand,'" said Mrs. Chatterly, reading the newspaper.

"Which proves that the Koreans are about the wisest nation on earth," suggested her husband.

"How's that, Joshua?"

"Well," said Mr. Chatterley, with distinct emphasis, "simply because they make a deity of a woman who has sense enough to give her chin a rest."

Mustard an Ancient Remedy.

Mustard is one of the most ancient of medicines. Pythagoras, who flourished between 500 and 600 years before Christ, mentions it. Hippocrates, who was born in 460 B. C., employed it. Pliny the Elder, writing in 77 A. D., describes three different kinds of mustard, and says the seeds were imported to Italy from Egypt originally.

The Romans used it as a stimulant after a cold bath; they mixed mustard oil and olive oil in equal parts and used this as a liniment for stiffness of the muscles. They knew the virtues of mustard poultices and of mustard as an emetic. As a remedy for the stings of scorpions and serpents, they pounded it, mixed it with vinegar and applied it to the wound.

They also made a drink out of it, fermenting the seed in a fiery spirit. The liquor thus produced they called mustum ardens, which means burning wine. The word mustard is probably derived from this.

The Man, the Mission and the Maid

When Hal Gilman got home from college he had left all such things as youth and folly behind him. He was more conscious of this than when, after the welcome home had quieted down a bit, he strolled out and glanced at the Blanchard porch. A dazzling young lady over there was arranging her fluffy summer gown picturesquely as she sat down in one of the big rocking chairs She was supplied with a pink book, the color of which matched her gown and her cheeks perfectly, but before she opened the book she gave the neighborhood a satisfied inspection and so saw the young man looking out upon his boyhood surroundings with the new eyes of extreme serious maturity.

"Welcome to our beautiful city!" called the girl gaily, rising from her chair.

It was Miss Blanchard after all. He had been in some doubt about it. "Pickles" he had used to call her. He shuddered at the memory of the dreadful word. A year ago, too, he would have vaulted over the picket fence that separated the two lawns, and in an instant more would have been sprawling upon the Blanchard steps. He remembered this also with a pang as he lifted his hat and made a dignified bow to her; then he walked sedately down the Gilman path and out at the Gilman gate; he walked sedately over to the Blanchard gate and opened it; he walked sedately up the Blanchard path and upon the Blanchard porch, where he deposited himself and his rigid Prince Albert carefully upon a chair, after having shaken hands most politely with the Blanchard young lady. "How you have blossomed!" he observed with a fatherly gravity that forbade any suspicion of gallantry. "I should scarcely have known you."

"We all change," she solemnly replied through lips that were full and red and most deliciously curved. "We bud, we blossom, we ripen and decay. Life—ah, life is merciless!"

"Yes," he admitted pensively "we are always growing older."

He was twenty-two and feeling for a mustache; so the weight of advancing years lay heavily upon him. Alice Blanchard reached over to lay her pink book upon the tabourette at her right hand, and the book-mark fell out. It was a large, square, creamtinted envelope and very fat. The address was in a man's bold chirography, and Mr. Gilman frowned as he noted it. This sort of thing was a part of the folly he had left behind him forever. Miss Alice picked up the letter, but she did not do it hastily, nor blush. She put it carefully back in the book; it was too sacred a thing to be treated flippantly. Already Alice Blanchard had met her Fate. She was a woman, now, with all the responsibilities and cares that come to a mature woman of nineteen.

Silence ensued. They looked out upon the pretty suburban street with thoughtful eyes.

"It must be fine to be a man," presently sighed Miss Blanchard; "to be able to go out in the world and fight for fame and fortune."

He turned reproachful eyes upon her.

"Fame!" he expostulated. "Fortune! There are too many of the world's greedy host after those empty honors."

Miss Blanchard was startled, but gave him instant comprehension. She, too, was just back from college.

"True," she sighed. "How true."

"As for myself," he went on, "my die is cast. I have already engaged to devote myself, after a short period of repose with the good grandparents who raised me, to the uplifting of humanity. Settlement work is to occupy my time henceforth."

His eye was calm but stern. He did not glow with enthusiasm. The cause was not one for mere boyish fervor. It was a man's serious, sober, solemn mission that he was undertaking.

"How noble!" breathed the girl.

"No!" he protested. "It is merely a debt that our family owes to humanity. Oh, you do not know, Miss Blanchard: you cannot conceive of the misery that abounds in this world!"

Miss Blanchard turned upon him large wide eyes that were deep and somber with sudden sorrow.

"Perhaps I do, though," she replied, softly. "Our own burdens teach us sympathy and understanding."

Her eyes turned from him, in explanation, to the fat envelope where its edge peeped out from the book. The envelope did not interest him much and he returned to the eyes. They were remarkably pretty eyes, very blue, indeed, and full of expression. The lashes above them were long and curved. The hair clustering about her white brow was of the exact golden shade that had let him stretch a point to call it red when he was a boy. Below its shining waves the tip of a pink ear was revealed. Her cheeks were rounded and creamy. Her neck was a firm white, beautifully modeled column that supported her small head most gracefully. Pickles! To think that he had ever called her Pickles!

Grandfather and Grandmother Gilman were looking out of the side window at them.

"Look at that, now!" said Grandfather Gilman. "Honestly, I feel like I wanted to paddle that boy! There he sits, as stiff as a poker, talking to the prettiest girl in Oakdale with no more life in him than if she was a sack of potatoes. Did I, at his age, ever sit like a tailor's dummy on any girl's front porch?"

"Adam," retorted Grandma Gilman, "my distinct recollection is that at twenty-two you were the biggest fool in the county."

The mail-man came up the street. Miss Blanchard ran down to the gate and he handed her a large, fat, square, cream-tinged envelope. Mr. Gilman had followed her.

"Have you anything for me?" he asked the mail-man. Mr. Halfred Joyce Gilman?"

The mail-man looked up with a start.

"Why, hello, Harry!" he cried heartily and held out his hand. "I didn't recognize you. How you have grown."

Mr. Halfred Joyce Gilman was too dignified to wince.

"There's scarcely any change in you, Mr. Powell," he said with lofty graciousness. "The years treat you very kindly, indeed."

"Getting gray—gray at a rat." And the mail-man jerked off his hat a moment. "Let me see. You asked about a letter. I got one here, but I hadn't any idea that Halfred Joyce Gilman could be you."

The letter he hunted out was a long, legal envelope. It bore, printed in one corner, the address of the Tenement House Sunshine league. Mr. Gilman took it with reverence, while the deep frown of concentration creased his brow.

"I shall have to ask you to excuse me," he said briskly to Miss Blanchard. "I have been waiting with some anxiety for this delayed communication. It is—well—the call of duty." He glanced at the fat envelope. "You, too, will be naturally anxious to see what Uncle Sam has brought you."

"I know beforehand," she said. "These envelopes bring me no surprises. They are my only rays of sunshine."

He smiled sadly and shook his head. He intended to devote himself solely and undividedly to humanity, and if he ever married at all it would be to some good woman who could aid him in his settlement work; even then only if he was convinced that they could do more together than they could separately.

"You must come over often," invited Miss Blanchard. "I am interested in your work."

"I should be glad indeed if I could interest you seriously in it," he assured her. "I shall consider it my duty to do so if I can."

In the pursuit of this duty he came over nearly every day and most of the evenings. Miss Blanchard did not go out much. The fat, square, creamtinted envelopes kept her at home; made her refuse many invitations that she might have been glad to accept had she been the unsettled, frivolous girl she used to be when she was young—say, seventeen or eighteen.

It was not long until Mr. Halfred Joyce Gilman knew all about the envelopes. She told him one evening when the family had gone out and they were alone on the Blanchard porch in the moonlight.

"Mr. Gilman," she observed tremulously. "I may trust you. We have known each other all our lives, and I never knew you to betray a confidence, even when we had our worst spats. Mr. Gilman—"

"You may call me Halfred," he interrupted with quite elderly gentleness, laying his hand protectingly upon hers, where it rested upon the arm of her chair. "You have no brother. You need one."

"Thank you, Halfred," she gratefully replied. "I am going to confide in you. Halfred, my parents are bent on ruining my life. I have an attachment, a deep and lasting attachment, and they frown upon it. I have never met him but twice, but we have corresponded ever since. At first it was only the ordinary boy and girl correspondence, of course; but as it grew it deepened and ripened into something far too precious for them to understand. You, however, are a man of the world. You can, perhaps, appreciate how vital an attachment like this becomes." And she quoted four verses from the "Rubaiyat" of Omar Khayyam to prove it.

"Yes, I know, I know," replied Halfred, with dreamy emphasis. "I had also, when I was younger, an attachment that might have altered the course of my entire life, but it was nipped in the bud. She—" he choked up a little bit very successfully—"she proved faithless."

"I am sorry, brother," she said, turning her hand palm upward to clasp his strong and supple fingers with a grip of understanding. "I would not have re-opened your wound for worlds."

"It is nothing," he replied in a hollow voice, leaving his hand in hers. "Nothing whatever. The same devotion I would have poured out for her I now intend to pour out for the weak and the fallen."

"I am so proud, so proud, of my brother," she murmured.

After that they were no longer Mr. Gilman and Miss Blanchard; they were Halfred and Alice, and they were more together than ever, if possible. They were an ideal couple for mere brother and sister. They found so much to talk about that they scarcely needed other companionship, and even when they were with gay parties they could always be found by themselves some place, discussing the glory of self-abnegation as evidenced in settlement work, or the callousness of parents who frowned upon providentially ordained attachments.

Meanwhile, there was peace on Oak street. Grandfather Gilman became almost reconciled to Hal's stiffness, and the Blanchards began to rest somewhat easier about the cream-tinted envelopes. One evening at dinner, however, Mr. Blanchard ventured to banter his daughter about Hal.

"Father," the fair young girl sternly reproved him, "how blind you are; how utterly mistaken! Mr. Gilman—Hal—and I are brother and sister, as we have always been. You must have but little respect for your daughter if you think she can be so fickle as your remarks would seem to indicate. Only one heart, father, is attuned to each other in this world. There is but one such harmony for me."

"I didn't like his looks," replied Mr. Blanchard in a weak attempt at self-defense.

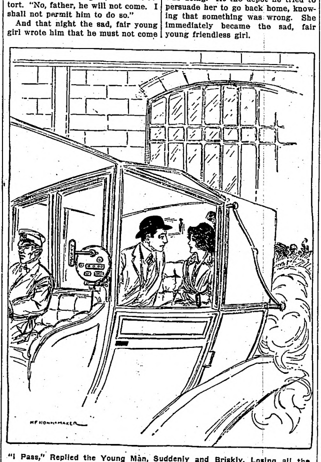
"Exactly! And you do not like him now!"

From her corsage peeped the corner of the latest fat, cream-tinted letter, and Mr. Blanchard eyed it with extreme disfavor.

"No," he admitted, "I do not like him; but I think that if I were a young man and knew this I would make it a point to come around and display my better side often enough to win confidence."

"And be insulted again," was the retort. "No, father, he will not come. I shall not permit him to do so."

And that night the sad, fair young girl wrote him that he must not come to Oakdale. Her father did not wish him to do so. In this she was not prevaricating; she merely wished to be oppressed. It was so sorrowfully and sobfully grand.



"I Pass," Replied the Young Man, Suddenly and Briskly, Losing all the Dignity That Had Weighted Him Down.

Strange enough, she did not confide this latest oppression to Brother Halfred. Of late they had referred less and less often to the cream-tinted envelopes, talking more about settlement work in place of it. It was very pleasant to discuss the hardships and distasteful features of living in slums while walking with a dear brother in the moonlight on balmy summer evenings. It was very pleasant to tuck this dainty blood-relative protectingly under an arm and take her, radiant in her beauty, to receptions and dinners and theaters.

They were very, very proud, indeed, of each other, almost more so than if they had been actual brother and sister; but, nevertheless, in the fall, just before Hal was to go away, a change came over Sister Alice. She grew abstracted, and sometimes when the square envelopes came she seemed to hesitate about opening them. Sometimes she put them away for a full half-day before she read them, and her answers to them were always delayed and always most painstakingly and laboriously written.

The result of this, at the other end of the correspondence, was but natural and logical. One day came a letter that threw her into a flutter of excitement. It made her gasp and hold her breath and turn pale and pink by turns. This thrilling letter—why, it was the very apotheosis of her carefully built-up romance! The stern demand it laid upon her was a call to heroism.

They were going to Hal's last function that night, an anniversary dinner at the Wheatherlys, and her brother was her escort. About nine o'clock Grandfather Gilman and Mr. Blanchard who were chatting together, noticed Miss Alice put on her wraps and slip out of the front door. Five minutes later Hal came to bid them goodby, and Mrs. Weatherly went to the door with Hal and his grandmother. Grandfather Gilman looked at Mr. Blanchard. Mr. Blanchard looked at Grandfather Gilman. Half an hour later Alice had not come back. Grandfather Gilman and Mr. Blanchard were still talking.

"By George!" said Mr. Blanchard, "I wonder where Alice has gone!"

"Possibly to the depot with Hal," replied Grandfather Gilman with a curious hesitation. "He has gone to New York to arrange for his fool settlement work; he will be back in about ten days, he says."

"Hum," said Mr. Blanchard, and he fidgeted for just a few minutes longer. "Say, Adam, there is a train due to leave within five minutes. Suppose we hurry down to the depot. I—I scarcely like to have her come home alone."

In the meantime Mr. Halfred Joyce Gilman had telephoned for a cab to be at his door and had hurried over home to get his suit-case. He threw it in the cab and was just about to follow in when a figure flew down the Blanchard path and a voice called out to him to wait. It was Alice. He gripped her hand tensely when she came running up to him.

"You didn't come over here to say goodby again?" he asked.

"No, I am going along," she half-laughed and half-sobbed. "I'll tell you in the cab."

He noticed for the first time that she carried a suit-case. Time, however, was pressing. He handed her in and sat beside her.

"Now, tell me about it," he said, bewildered, but she had changed her mind. She could not tell him now. She only clung to his arm, herself gasping at the audacity of what she was doing. At the depot he tried to persuade her to go back home, knowing that something was wrong. She immediately became the sad, fair young friendless girl.

"You are my only friend and you must do as I say. This is the crisis of my life, Brother Hal, and I must meet it like a brave woman."

He shook his head, but she had already picked up her suit-case briskly, and was walking on with a determined step. All he could do was to take her suit-case from her and carry both.

The train was just pulling out when Grandfather Gilman and Mr. Blanchard arrived at the depot. They had no difficulty in finding out that Hal, who was known, and Alice, whom they could easily describe, had purchased tickets for New York. Grandfather Gilman and Mr. Blanchard turned as by one impulse and shook hands until their eyes watered. Nothing could have pleased them better.

"Let's go telegraph them," said Grandfather Gilman. "I know Hal's hotel. The young rascal!"

In the meantime Mr. Halfred Joyce Gilman was compelling his sister to tell him things, insisting on a brother's right in the matter.

She was eloping!

Mr. Halfred Joyce Gilman moistened his lips. He had a peculiar grip at his throat, and he felt very lonesome all at once. A profound distaste for settlement work, even, settled upon him. Nevertheless, he stiffened himself. If his Sister Alice was so deeply and irrevocably attached as this it was his duty to see that she attained happiness, and he would do it like a man. He told her so.

They chatted very practically now. They discussed the deep and solemn sacrifice that a woman must make when she gave up her girlhood home to make a new home for a noble man. His nearness was such a support to her. She would never have had the courage to take the step if he had not been coming on this train. Never! She snuggled closer to him and wanted to cry. She didn't know why.

It was only about a three hours' ride to the city, and she grew more and more nervous as they approached it. When they had alighted from the train a young man, though considerably older than Hal, came toward them. He was not a very prepossessing young man. There were pouches beneath his eyes and his lips were thick and wide. He wore a loud tie, and a suit and overcoat of wondrously checked pattern. Alice saw him first, and she gripped Hal's arm more tightly. She did not experience the bounding joy to which she had so long looked forward when she should greet this Prince of the World. She had it upon the tip of her tongue to cry out to Hal that she did not want to elope, that she wanted to go back home, but the pride which had made her keep up the romance she had builded, even after it had lost its interest to her, and which had made her plunge into this daring escapade in spite of both her judgment and her inclination, now held her silent to meet her devouring fate.

She glanced half in terror from the approaching young man to Hal. She was startled at the change in her quasi-brother. He had stiffened himself to his full five-foot-seven of athletic height. His nostrils were dilated and his eyes were glaring, but he smiled, actually smiled, as if in the glee of coming battle. The approaching young man suddenly caught sight of young Gilman and stopped short, as if startled. Then he came on slowly, hesitatingly, looking from one to the other.

"Why didn't you tell me this fellow's name? Why didn't I ask?" demanded Hal; but he really was pleased.

There was no time for reply. The young man had come up to them. Hal turned on him savagely.

"Well, Peyson?" he inquired.

"How do, Gilman?" said Mr. Peyson with a jerky nod, and then held out his hands to Alice, with an evident intention to ignore her escort from that moment on.

Hal stepped between them.

"Peyson, I'll give you just two minutes to get out of sight," he pleasantly observed. "If you'll remember, we gave you 24 hours at college. You had things to pack up there. You haven't here!"

Mr. Peyson looked at him curiously for an instant and moistened his lips, then he suddenly wheeled, and a moment later they saw him worming his way through the crowd.

"I'm sorry, Alice, that I can't tell you the details about him," Hal said.

She was standing very stiff and straight herself.

"I don't care to hear. I know enough. I am just praying my gratitude that I am not to be linked for life to any man whom another man could make run without an explaantion."

Hal scarcely heard her. Already he was consulting a time-table. It had taken them three hours to make the trip. They had started at 9:30, and it was now 12:30. There was not another train back until three o'clock in the morning, and it would not land her in Oakdale until daylight. She had not comprehended to the full phase of it as yet. But Hal swiftly decided that whatever they did and wherever they went they could not stand there, and he bundled her into a cab.

It was not until they were rolling away from the depot that she thought with a gasp of the possible consequences of her act, and cried: "What are we to do?"

"I pass," replied the young man, suddenly and briskly losing all the dignity that had weighted him down when he got his sheepskin, and reverting once more to the slang of early college days. "It looks to me as if we were in a jam. Never you mind, though. Rely on your Uncle Dudley. He'll put rouge and cold cream and violet talcum on the face of this thing, and don't forget it. Do you know anybody here that you could visit?"

"Not a soul," she wailed. "I only know one family, and they are abroad."

"Never mind," he said, patting her hand where it lay trembling on his arm. "You just keep your eye on Little Willie. First of all we are driving over to my hotel, where I shall leave my suit-case and send a couple of telegrams. Then we'll do a real quick-thinking stunt. Did you ever see me think? It will be a positive joy to you."

She nestled confidently up to him. His voice sounded so good and strong, and she liked him so much better since he had dropped his age. She was glad, oh! so glad, that he had happened to come with her!

At the hotel Hal jumped out with his suit-case. He left her in the cab, but presently he came out, chuckling. He had two telegrams in his hand. One of them he had not opened, but the other he read and re-read with evident appreciation.

"You'd better open this one before I show you mine," he said, handing the unopened telegram to her.

She looked at the inscription. It was addressed to Mrs. Halfred Joyce Gilman. She handed it back demurely.

"It certainly isn't for me," she said with a laugh that had a suspicion of a tear or two in it.

"It doesn't seem to be for anybody," he retorted, laughing a bit nervously himself, and tore it open. It was from her father.

"My dear girl," it read, "you are a very, very foolish child, but it is no trouble at all to forgive you. Come back home as soon as you can."

He handed them both to her.

"You precious young rascal," read Grandfather Gilman's message, "if you are already married when you get this, remember there's got to be another ceremony in Oakdale."

"It looks to me as if we had to make good, Pickles," laughed Hal. "I know where there is a preacher that works overtime." And giving a crisp direction, he jumped into the cab with her. Somehow or other her head happened on his shoulder. Funny that women should cry when they are happy.

A London Ghost Story

A wonderful ghost story is agitating high society, according to the London Express. The principals are people of the highest social position.

The vicar of a Kensington church was leaving the church after his choir practice, when a lady stepped out of the aisle and asked him in agitated tones to come with her at once to an address near by.

"A gentleman is dying there," she said. "He is extremely concerned about the state of his soul, and anxious to see you before he dies."

The clergyman followed her to a waiting taxicab, and a short drive round the corner brought them to a mansion. The lady, who seemed to be extremely agitated, urged the vicar to hurry. He sprang out of the cab, rang the bell, and a butler appeared.

"Does Mr. —— live here?"

"Yes, sir."

"I hear he is seriously ill, and has sent for me."

The butler expostulated that his master was not ill, that as a matter of fact he was in the best of health.

"But this lady"—exclaimed the vicar, as he turned round, and then an expression of blank astonishment came over him.

The taxicab and the lady had completely disappeared.

The butler looked on the clergyman as either a madman or a practical joker, and was about to slam the door when his master came along the passage and inquired what it was all about.

"Are you Mr. ——?" asked the clergyman. "I heard that you were seriously ill, that you were concerned about your soul, and that you had sent for me."

He described the lady who had brought him, and the "dying" man said he could not identify her; that he had no such friend or acquaintance. They discussed this matter on the doorstep for a few moments, and then the clergyman was invited to come inside.

"It is very strange," said Mr.——, "that you should have been sent on such an errand, in such a mysterious way. As a matter of fact, though I am perfectly well, I have been troubled lately about the state of my soul, and I have been seriously contemplating calling upon you to discuss the matter with you.

"Now that you are here let us brush aside this strange incident, and if you will give me the time we will discuss what has been on my conscience."

The clergyman stayed for an hour or so, and it was then arranged that his new acquaintance should come to the church the next morning and they would continue their discussion after service.

He did not appear at the church, and the vicar, very much interested, called to see what was the matter. He was met at the door by the butler, who told him that his master had died 10 minutes after he left the house on the previous evening.

They went upstairs to the bedroom where the dead man lay, and on a table in the middle of the room stood a portrait of the lady who had brought the clergyman in the cab from the church.

"Who is that?" asked the astonished clergyman.

"That, sir," replied the butler, "is my master's wife, who died 15 years ago."

First Aerial Spy.

Herr Michowski, a German Pole attached to a Leipsic firm of aeroplane manufacturers, is now languishing in a Russian prison, and is likely to become famous as the world's first flying spy. He was arrested early in February in the neighborhood of Warsaw, having, as he alleged, lost his way in a fog and been compelled to effect an emergency landing. The Russian military authorities were persuaded that his presence near important fortifications concerned espionage, and he is now formally indicted on that charge. The German government has so far tried in vain to secure his release on representation that Michowski at the time of his flight over Russian territory, was engaged in an attempt to win one of the long distance prizes offered by the German national flying endowment.

Life's Hardships.

A tragic case occurred recently in a court of law at Amberg, Germany. A young girl who was called as a witness begged to be spared the ordeal of having to answer the usual questions with regard to her past. She had, she said, a position as cashier and had just become engaged, and she feared that she would be utterly disgraced if she was obliged to state publicly the fact that she had when very young been punished for a small theft. The court nevertheless insisted on her answering the question, and the girl thereupon opened a vein in court. She now lies in danger of death.

Farm Wages Rising Faster Than Factory Pay

WASHINGTON.—The money wages of farm labor increased about 2.5 per cent during the past year, and about 11 per cent during the past four years. Since 1902 the increase has been about 36 per cent. These estimates are based upon reports of correspondents of the bureau of statistics (agricultural forecasts) of the department of agriculture.

Wages of farm labor tended upward during the decade of the seventies; they were almost stationary during the eighties, and declined from 1892 to 1894, since which time they have steadily tended upward. Farm wages now, compared with wages during the eighties, are about 55 per cent higher; compared with the low year of 1894, wages are now about 67 per cent higher. The current average rate of farm wages in the United States, when board is included, is, by the month, $21.38; by the day, other than harvest, $1.16; at harvest, $1.57. When board is not included, the rate is, by the month, $30.31; by the day, other than harvest, $1.50; by the day, at harvest, $1.94.

Wages in different sections of the United States vary widely, averaging highest in the far western states and lowest in the South Atlantic states. For instance, the monthly rate, without board, is $56.50 in Nevada; $54 in Montana, and $51 in Utah; but $17.90 in South Carolina, $19.60 in Mississippi, and $20.20 in Georgia. The highest state average, $56.50, is thus seen to be 3.2 times higher than the lowest rate, $17.90.

The money wages of farm labor have increased relatively more than wages for labor in city manufacturies during the past 20 to 30 years.

Animals Run to Cover at Blast Warning Shout

"FIRE in the hole!" This shout of warning is well understood by employes of construction companies engaged in blasting work. It means there will be an explosion. Every man near by drops his pick or shovel and runs for shelter. Now, would you believe animals have learned the meaning of this warning? If you doubt it go out to the Zoological Gardens and see for yourself.

FIRE IN TH' HOLE

There a tunnel through solid rock, completely under the garden, is being made for the extension of a sewer through to Chevy Chase.

It has taken four months to cut 1,050 feet. Two shifts of men, each working eight hours, cut from 10 to 12 feet every 16 hours. The tunnel begins at the Rock creek loop of the Capital Traction railway lines and runs directly north. It is six feet wide and six and one-half feet high. Not a grain of dirt has been struck since the tunnel was started. Every inch has been through the toughest of blue granite.

Now back to the "fire in the hole" warning.

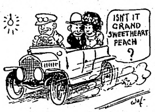
When a blast is ready the shout is given and the workmen rush out of the tunnel to safety. The ground rumbles and shakes. Sentinels at the mouth of the tunnel send along the warning by yelling "fire in the hole."

During the first few weeks of the work the animals paid little attention to the shout, but were frightened at the rumbling beneath them. Now they have learned the meaning of the cry.

The foxes, the prairie dogs, and the guinea pigs run to their holes; the lion roars his disapproval, the elephant gets in one corner of his house and stays there until the earth ceases to rumble; the beavers dive off in the water and hike to their caves beneath the banks, while the grizzly bear beats it for his tavern beneath a cliff of jagged rocks; the peacock struts a little, then trembles in fear; and the monkey clings in terror to the bars of his cage.

Honeymooners Enjoy Ride in Senate Tunnel Auto

AUTOMOBILE honeymooning in the senate subway was inaugurated by a pair of newlyweds, with economy as their watchword and ingenuity as their guide, in a search for thrillers. From the capitol to the senate office building runs a tunnel, equipped with automobiles for the transportation of senators. Young chauffeurs pilot the cars in this damp passageway, which boasts no scenery but long strings of incandescent lights.



ISN'T IT GRAND SWEETHEART PEACH ?

Despite the romantic repellence of the place, a gaily bedecked bride and her lord boarded one of the cars at the office building end of the tube and "cooed" as it spun along to the capitol landing.

"Capitol," said the chauffeur. "All out." The happy pair never moved.

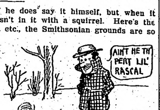
"Let's ride back, George!" exclaimed the bride. "Isn't it thrilling?"

Back they rode, and for half an hour they whirled back and forth, while the chauffeur smiled and senators chuckled.

"Wasn't it grand?" chirped the bride, as George dizzily helped her from the car after the fifteenth spin.

Are Squirrels Superior to Men as Engineers?

MAN is a mighty clever creature if he does say it himself, but when it comes to engineering he simply isn't in it with a squirrel. Here's the proof: In the good old summer time, etc., the Smithsonian grounds are so many acres of grass and trees and trees and trees—and sparrows.



AIN'T HE TH' PERT LIL' RASCAL

One day last winter the acres were white and deep and smooth, as if the weather man had sheeted and tucked them in.

Across one stretch of sparkling crustiness which is a lawn underneath a squirrel kangarooed with such irresponsible activity that a kind-hearted government clerk who was homing from work paused to consider the cruelty of nature in leaving so helpless a creature to starve—not being able to eat snow like Gen. G. at Valley Forge.

But the squirrel wasn't caring. It just leaped over the glazed white until —with a sudden, decisive stop—it poked its nose in the snow and burrowed down until only the end of its tail showed above the hole.

Then it came to the surface with a nut between its teeth and kangarooed back to where it came from.

Oh, yes, dear man, you can dig Panama canals and root out tunnels, and harness a wilderness, and bridge canyons and rivers, and all that, but——

There isn't one of you on top of the earth, or under it, who can—or ever could—locate, first lick, a nut buried beneath a waste of snow without a guide of some sort to go by. That's what you couldn't!

DUCHESS OF MARLBOROUGH ACTIVE

The duchess of Marlborough in an interview in London the other day on the aims of the Women's Municipal party, of which she is the president, said:

"That women have for so long held aloof from the active exercise of the vote in local government is due to the fact that they do not realize the value of political unity. Now the St. Marylebone Women's Local Government association has been the means of showing us what vigor women can bring into the political life of London.

"For a start at their next meeting on March 27 a basis will be drawn up on which our work will be founded. From the women who sign we shall pick the cleanest and most ready spirits as the women's party candidates for the next borough council and London county council elections. They will be pledged to a program of progressive social legislation. They will not seek votes on the catch words of either of the men's municipal parties but will let the voters see plainly what they stand for.

"We want to form a party at municipal elections which will have the same political effect as the entry of a labor party candidate at parliamentary elections. We aim at supplying the need of a central electoral machine which in conjunction with other local government associations will produce a party of women so strong that it can approach party agents before a vacancy is declared and insist that a suitable woman candidate shall run on party lines."

MRS. SHAFROTH A STUDENT

"If I could, I should like to go to college always," said Mrs. John F. Shafroth, wife of the senator from Colorado, in Washington the other day. "This reminds me of a story I once heard about a man who was left a legacy with an income to be paid as long as he should continue to remain in college. The story went on to say that at the age of eighty the man was still in college.

"Now, I have no such ulterior motive as that, but I love teachers and all that pertains to study. I should count it the greatest joy if I had time to take a college course every year."

All of which brings one abruptly to a consideration of the question why our western women have such active and alert mentalities. Is it because the climate of the West is intensely invigorative, and therefore stimulative of mind as well as body, or it is that the inheritance of a pioneer tenacity from their mothers and grandmothers has induced a desire not to be denied once it fixes itself upon a certain aim?

In any case, the fact remains that western women have a mental intentness and vivacity not exceeded by that of the women of any other part of the country.

Mrs. Shafroth is a shining example in this respect of western womankind. She is intellectual as well as clever. She is acquainted with her country's progress from the political as well as the artistic standpoint.

BUYS DUKE'S RARE VOLUMES?

According to a London cablegram Henry Edwards Huntington, an American millionaire, has purchased the great library of the duke of Devonshire. The library contains many rare volumes, and it is said the purchase price exceeds $1,000,000.

The Chatsworth library, consisting of the Claxtons and Kemble collection of plays, are part of the collection. The British museum was anxious to obtain the rare editions, but was obliged to retire from the contest owing to the lack of funds, according to the report.

Included in the purchase, are 23 Claxtons, a score of Shakespeare lowe, Green, and other Elizabethians. quartos, plays by Ben Jonson, Mar- The collection was sold by Kemble to the sixth duke of Devonshire for $10,000. It is said that in order to avoid adverse public opinion the books were shipped out of the country secretly.

Mr. Huntington was born in Oneonta, N. Y., February 27, 1850, and began business life in the hardware trade in his native town. His fortune, however, was made in the railroad construction business. His first venture in this line was made in 1880.

AMERICAN GIRL IN HIGH POSITION

Another American woman of distinguished family, Mme. Grouitch, will soon do her share in carrying American civilization to the Balkans, when she goes to Belgrade, where her husband has been appointed secretary of foreign affairs. She is now in America on a flying visit. She is well known in exclusive society circles of New York, Chicago, Washington and other large cities.

Mme. Grouitch, who was formerly Miss Gordon of Virginia, met her husband at Athens when both were students there. After they had married he rose to be Servian minister to England, and with him she played an important part in the high social circles of the British metropolis and Paris.

She did notable work for the wounded of her adopted country during the Balkan war, and made a tour of America in the interests of the wounded soldiers. Later she went to Belgrade to work in the hospitals. King Peter and the two young princes are delighted that she is to live in their capital.

St. Louis Horse Seeks Styles and Wrecks Shop

ST. LOUIS, MO.—A negro employed by the Kroger Grocery company was leading a horse west on Market street the other afternoon, when the horse started into an alley near Twenty-third street, broke loose and with a singletree attached to the harness trailing behind, entered a clothing store, and in 30 seconds did more serious damage than the proverbial bull in a china shop.

After jerking loose from the negro, the horse galloped into Market street and appropriated the sidewalk.

At 2309 Market street Harry and Benjamin Yatkeman conduct a second-hand clothing store. To display their goods to advantage a dummy, dressed a la John Drew, is placed on each side of the door, the latter being open in welcome to the prospective purchaser.

The horse discovered the store and evidently took a liking to the styles displayed. He entered the store. The singletree caught both doorway dummies and they fell to the pavement.

After invading the store the horse started for the rear, where the more advanced styles are kept. On the way an art cuspidor was in his way. Mr. Horse promptly put a foot down on it.

At the end of the store is a stairway leading to a fitting balcony. Toward this the horse headed, turning over several tables, chairs and other things.

The negro rushed in at this moment.

"Will you take $25 for the damage, boss?" he asked Ben. Ben thought hard for a moment.

"I've got an awful pain in my leg," Ben said. "I'll have to wait and talk it over with Harry."

Most $5 Bills Are Not Jokes; This One Was

KANSAS CITY, MO.—A $5 bill is no joke nowadays; but a grocer over on the South side managed to derive considerable excitement from a phony $5 bill the other day. An enterprising wholesale firm got out a phony bill with its advertisement printed on it in fine letters. The South side grocer was presented with one and thrust it in his pocket that evening when he went home to dinner. His wife was reading the bargain page in the paper when he reached home and inquired into the state of the family exchequer.

GIME THEM FIVE ONES !!!

"You never give me any money," she complained. "Surprise me once with a piece of money without my asking."

"Sure thing," said the grocer, and handed over the phony bill. It was examined—and execrated in the same breath. Then the wife put it in a sugar bowl on the sideboard, where the maid found it later in the evening. The maid happened to need about that much, so she appropriated it to her own uses.

Early the next morning she hurried down to a corner store and had the bill changed to five ones, which she adroitly concealed in her shoe, according to the latest ideas in the women detective stories she was reading at the time. About two hours later the missus was a trifle surprised to find an enraged storekeeper on her front step, holding her phony $5 bill in his hand and demanding his money back.

"I want those five ones," he howled. The maid discreetly retired to the kitchen and laced her shoe a little tighter.

"If you'd just explain," said the mistress, "maybe I'd have some idea of what all this is about."

"Your maid brought this $5 bill to my store this morning and said you wanted it changed to ones," sputtered the storekeeper.

The maid was haled to the court of inquiry, and with many tears and sobs confessed to her unholy hankering for five bucks. She unlaced the money, was fired on the spot and the incident closed.

Allow Them to Smoke at Women's Select Club

NEW YORK.—Just off Fifth avenue, in the wonderful new section of town which is growing up around the Grand Central terminal, is the Women's University club. At 106 East Forty-second street, to be precise, its nine neat stone stories loom up briskly. I was convoyed thither by a Smith college alumna, writes our New York correspondent.

"Oh, dear me, how distressing!" she exclaimed at the entrance. I had thrown away about half of one of my favorite cigars. "You don't think we'd be as inhospitable as that?" she continued. "Men guests are always privileged to smoke here. We can, too, though few of the girls do."

So I lit up a fresh butt and we invaded the sacred precincts, leaving in our trail an odor of burning tobacco.

"Each section is furnished by a different college," explained Miss Smith. "We did the library on the third floor. Vassar the living room on the fourth floor, Bernard the reception room on the first floor, and the "U" of Chicago the dressing room on the first floor. Wells gave the silver, and so on."

Tells Court Why He Stole "Rags" for His Girl

DETROIT, MICH.—"Lawsee, but dat gal o' Dave Ross's was shuah 'nuff dolled up—jes' lak chicken, boy, an' Dave done gabe 'er eb'ry one dem rags, too." "Dave" Ross stole the five ladies' short coats—he freely admitted it when arraigned in police court before Justice Stein on the complaint of Caspar Kuschinski, who keeps a store on Gratiot avenue.

On the same charge, another person of the same hue was arraigned with "Dave"—Harry Williams, but "Dave" Cleared Williams of all complicity in the theft and the latter was discharged.

"You-all admits that you-all stole these clothes, do you, Dave?" asked Justice Stein.

"Yessuh, Ah admits it, all right, seein' as dey done got de goods on me," said Dave, with a grin. "But Ah was de on'y one, jedge—Harry here didn't hab nuffin' tall ter do wif it."

Testimony showed that Kuschinski had not known of the theft until Patrolman John Hayes had come to him and asked the storekeeper if he had missed any clothes from his stock.

"Stole them for your girl, did you, Dave?" asked the court.

"Yessuh," said Dave, honestly. "Yuh see, jedge, Ah jes' done had ter do it. She telled me, Lindy did, dat if Ah didn't dress 'er up lak de oder swell queens paradin' de streets dat she'd leab me an' git anudder man. So Ah went out an'—well, yo' honoh, Ah's still got dat gal, anyhow."

Justice Stein found Dave guilty of the charge and suspended sentence.

FOUR GUNMEN PAY PENALTY OF CRIME

WENT TO ELECTRIC CHAIR AT DAWN FOR ROSENTHAL MURDER.

ORDER OF DEATH UNKNOWN

Nothing to Indicate Any One of Them Confessed Before End, Although Rumor Perists "Dago Frank" Did.

Ossining, N. Y., April 14. — Harry Horowitz, Louis Rosenberg, Frank Cirofici and Frank Seidenschner have paid the death penalty.

As the gunmen whose picturesque aliases were flung across the continent after the murder of Herman Rosenthal, the gambler, they died at dawn today in the electric chair at Sing Sing prison, convicted of that crime.

No Confessions Made.

To relatives who bade them goodbye and to their spiritual advisers the four condemned men again declared their innocence and there is nothing to indicate that they did not deny their guilt until the end.

Which went first to the chair was a secret that only the warden knew. It was to depend, it was said, upon their demeanor. He upon whom the ordeal bore the heaviest, whose nerves gave evidence of snapping, would be first despatched, thus to obviate a scene.

James Clancy, warden of the prison, rigidly observing conventions surrounding even electrocutions, shook his head and turned away when the subject of the order of death was mentioned.

"Nearer My God to Thee."

Easter Sunday and the night that followed was almost one continuous prayer for the condemned. They were on their knees practically all of the time that they were not talking with relatives. A prisoner in a distant cell now and then blew from a battered cornet the quavering notes of "Nearer My God to Thee," and in the death house proper a phonograph played sacred music.

On the board walks in front of the prison the curious townspeople passed to and fro, whispering, and every now and then a party of city automobilists swung from their car to survey the buildings.

In the cut, just under the prison eaves, express trains roared past while a wind out of the west whipped up whitecaps on the Hudson.

Of the scenes in the death house corridors that which stood out boldest concerned the visit of two nuns. As Father Cashin, the Roman Catholic prison chaplain, led the four gunmen in prayer, two Italian Franciscan sisters, who had come from New York to see Dago Frank, whom they had taught in his boyhood, knelt outside his cell.

Raised curtains, showing the cells bare and immaculate, disclosed the four gunmen also kneeling. Suddenly the spirit of devotion spread to the whole death chamber. Every one of the 16 condemned, among them three Chinamen and Hans Schmidt, slayer of Anna Aumuller, joined in the Lord's prayer.

Last Messages Sent.

To the boys of the East Side in New York the Jewish trio of the gunmen sent a final message through Rabbi Jacob Goldstein.

"Whitey Lewis" wrote: "Keep away from bad company, is the best message I can send."

"Lefty Louis" said: "Add what I said the other day about bad company. A fellow who honestly earns $6 a week is better off than he who gets $1,000 a week, if he does not get it straight."

"I must die some time," "Lefty Louie" told his wife. "If it pleases God that I die now, I am ready.'

"Whitey Lewis" asked his brother to tell their mother that she was not the mother of a murderer.

"I have never been more than a little wild," he said.

The prisoners were not left alone for a single instant during the day or night.

At 3 o'clock the final prayers were said. Father Cashin knelt with "Dago Frank" and received his final confession. The rabbis, Goldstein and Kopkstein, prepared the other gunmen for the end.

Rumors persist here that "Dago" Frank" Cirofici had made a confession. These rumors were discredited at the prison, however, and the midnight visit of Chaplain Cashin to "Dago Frank's" cell was without development.

Warships to Test Canal.

San Diego, Cal., April 14.—United States warships of the Atlantic fleet will steam through the Panama canal early in July, speed up the Pacific coast to San Diego and return to Hampton Roads by the same route, according to Franklin D. Roosevelt, assistant secretary of the navy, who inspected San Diego harbor and made preliminary arrangements for the reception of the battleships. The purpose of this early jaunt through the canal, he said, was to prove that the big waterway was even now ready.

VILLA'S CAVALRY PURSUING THE FEDERALS

General Villa's cavalry photographed outside Torreon as they were starting in pursuit of the survivors of the Federal garrison after the capture of that city.

FEDERALS HOLD BLUE JACKETS

PARTY OF U. S. MARINES ARE ARRESTED AT TAMPICO.

Detained Short Time, However—Apology From Huerta—San Pedro Said to Have Been Evacuated.

Mexico City, April 13.—A launch from the United States gunboat Dolphin, carrying the paymaster and a small detachment of marines, put in at Iturbide bridge at Tampico. The Americans were after a supply of gasoline. They were in uniform, but unarmed. The launch flew the American flag.

Col. Hinojosa, commanding a detachment of Mexican federals, placed the paymaster and his men under arrest. They were paraded through the streets and held for a time under detention.

Admiral Mayo made vigorous representations to the authorities and the men were released. General Ignacio Zaragoza expressed to Admiral Mayo his regret.

Although President Huerta in an official statement to Nelson O'Shaughnessy, the American Charge d'Affaires, has apologized for the unusual zealousness of the Mexican commander at Tampico, there exists here great uneasiness because Admiral Mayo is reported to have given the government authorities at Tampico until but a few hours to salute the American colors.

Say Federals Are Attacking.

An agent of the American embassy reporting from Saltillo says that General Velazco, who commanded the federal forces at Torreon during the attack by Villa, has succeeded in uniting with Generals Maas and De Moure and that the combined forces are now attacking Torreon.

Tampico Attacks Diminishing.

Vera Cruz.—An official report sent by the commanding officer at Tampico, General Zaragoza, to the minister of war, through this port, says that he had to face a severe attack from the rebels several days ago, but since then the attacks have been diminishing in force each day. He reports that only four federals were wounded and none killed, but that he is exceedingly short of ammunition.

San Pedro Is Taken.

Juarez, Mex.—San Pedro, 40 miles north of Torreon, was evacuated by the federals in the face of superior numbers, according to a report from General Villa to General Carranza.

RADIUM BILL UP TO SENATE

Senator Walsh Opens Argument on Government Control of Producing Lands.

Washington, April 13.—Debate in the senate on the bill in favor of the government control of the radium ore bearing lands of the West was opened by Chairman Walsh of the mines committee.

Emphasizing the importance of the measure, Senator Walsh said radium-bearing ores were not only to be found in Colorado and Utah, but in Montana and probably would be found in other states. He added that the bureau of mines and two eminent doctors were conducting separate experiments in the methods of producing radium, which would be given to the public if successful.

The committee's findings upon the curative properties of radium, Senator Walsh assured the senate, would be fully discussed before the bill was taken up in detail.

Woman Air Rider Killed.

London, April 13.—The aviator Reichelt carried a woman passenger with him on a flight. At a height of 200 feet the motor exploded and the monoplane shot blazing to the earth. The woman was dead when extricated. Reichelt died at a hospital. On several previous occasions Reichelt had narrow escapes from death. Once in 1913, with a passenger aboard, at a height of 6,000 feet, his motor stopped and he had to plane downward, through a heavy fog, in the darkness.

CHOICE OF RESERVE CITIES DEFENDED

REGIONAL BANK COMMITTEE ANSWERS CRITICS OF SELECTIONS.

HAD TO DISAPPOINT SOME

Thirty-seven Applicants for 12 Places—Particular Attention Paid to Complaints From Southern Cities.

Washington, April 13.—The federal reserve bank organization committee has issued a statement defending its choice of reserve bank cities and definition of reserve districts.

Answers to Criticisms.

It was the first official answer made to criticisms voiced in congress and heard from cities which sought reserve banks but failed to get them. For the first time some of the data used by the committee on reaching its conclusions was made public.

Particular attention was given to the committee's reasons for choosing Atlanta, Ga., and Dallas, Tex., in preference to New Orleans; for selecting Richmond, Va., instead of Baltimore, and for naming Kansas City instead of Denver, Col., Omaha, or Lincoln, Neb. The committee called attention to the fact that since 37 cities were applicants and only 12 named, 25 had to be disappointed.

Misunderstanding Revealed.

"With so many conflicting claims," the statement said, "somebody had to judge. Congress constituted the committee a court and gave the federal reserve board the power to review. Disappointed competitors should seek a remedy through the orderly process the law prescribes.

"Critics of the decision of the committee reveal more misunderstanding and do not know, or appear not to know, that the federal reserve banks are bankers' banks and not ordinary commercial banks; that they are to hold the reserves and to clear the checks for member banks, make rediscounts for them and engage in certain open market operations. As a matter of fact, the ordinary every day banking relations of the community, of business men and of banks will not be greatly modified or altered."

WANT PUBLIC LAND SETTLED

Western Governors Urge This With View to Complete Jurisdiction for States.

Denver, April 13.—Speedy settlement of the remaining public lands of the western states with a view to complete jurisdiction by every state of all land within its borders, was urged upon congress by the Western Governors' conference.

The governors reaffirmed in full their platform of last year in which was set forth the policy on various subjects held by the executives to be vital to the building of the West.

While the governors were preparing to close their conference with the adoption of resolutions, the irrigation conference debated ways and means of raising money for irrigation projects.

Clinton for Senate in Iowa.

Marshalltown, Iowa, April 11.—M. L. Christian of Clinton, Iowa, was nominated here for United States senator. Malcolm Smith of Cedar Rapids was chosen as the candidate for governor. The convention adopted a platform, the three principal features of which advocated the repeal of the law permitting the operation of saloons under restrictions, the resubmission of the prohibition amendment to a vote of the people of the state, and the enactment of woman's suffrage legislation

EXPLOSION; 2 KILLED, 1 DYING

FIRE CHIEF AND ONE ASSISTANT DEAD AT DAWSON, MINN.

Four Buildings Destroyed at Loss of $60,000 in Fire Which Breaks Out as Result.

Dawson, Minn., April 14.—Two firemen were killed, one fatally hurt and two others injured as the result of fire and explosion which destroyed four buildings, forced several others out of line and shattered $4,000 worth of plate glass windows in the business part of this town. The total loss will probably exceed $60,000.

The dead are: Fire Chief Elmer Thompson and Herbert Farmen.

Marvin E. Jacobson was fatally injured.

The other injured are: Arthur Kreisel, struck in head by falling stone; John C. Hanson, wrist nearly severed by broken glass.

The explosion occurred at 2 o'clock in the morning, awakening the townspeople from their slumbers and being distinctly heard by farmers six miles away.

Flames broke out immediately following the blast and spread rapidly in spite of the best efforts of the volunteer fire department, which was early on the scene. Fire Chief Thompson was one of the first to arirve when the alarm was turned in. He was standing in front of the building occupied by the Holtan restaurant, when the explosion occurred, lifting the entire roof from the building and burying Thompson in the debris.

Herbert Farmen, another volunteer fireman, was struck in the head by a falling brick, dying almost instantly.

The flames spread rapidly to adjoining buildings and soon the whole block was in flames.

Matt Wire, the local miller, who lived in apartments over the Holtan restaurant, managed to get his wife, two daughters and a son out of the building with difficulty. The flames were then playing along the north wall of the building.

The fire department was powerless to stay the work of the flames, which soon reached the J. E. Lund Hardware store, adjoining, and from there spread to the Citizens' State bank and the Jackson & Emerson's Merchandise store. The four buildings destroyed represent a loss of $22,000. The loss on the stock and fixtures will reach $34,000, all of which is partly covered by insurance.

The cause of the fire is a matter of conjecture, but is believed to have been caused by a charge of nitro-glycerine or gun-cotton. The fire marshal's office has been notified and an investigation may be ordered.

Sparta Maneuvers Less Extensive

La Crosse, Wis., April 13.—According to an announcement by the war department the present outline for encampment and maneuver work for the coming summer, which will be held on the national military reservation at Sparta, will not be as extensive as had been anticipated some months ago. The gathering of the regulars on the Mexican border has affected the situation.

Mrs. Taft Against Suffrage.

New Haven, Conn., April 13.—Mrs. William Howard Taft, wife of the former president, has become a member of the local Anti-Woman suffrage association, according to an announcement made by the organization.

Wilsons on Easter Vacation.

White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., April 11.—President Wilson reached here for a three-day stay, the object of which is to benefit the health of Mrs. Wilson. In the party are also the Misses Margaret and Eleanor Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Francis Bowes Sayre, Secretary Tumulty and Dr. Cary T. Grayson, U. S. N. The party traveled in a private car over the Chesapeake & Ohio railway. The president will leave here Sunday night, returning to Washington early Monday morning.

ARNOLD GIRL CASE VERY MYSTIFYING

DISTRICT ATTORNEY JACKSON SAYS SHE LIVES—FATHER DENIES THIS.

MEREDITH HEARING TUESDAY

Doctor Who Operated "House of Mystery" Slated for Preliminary Trial with Associates Tomorrow.

Pittsburgh, April 13.—"Dorothy Arnold, the missing New York heiress, came to Pittsburgh soon after her disappearance in 1910 and became a patient at D. C. C. Meredith's private hospital at Bellevue, known as the 'house of mystery.' Miss Arnold never recovered from her illness and she is now dying at her home in New York, where she has been for the last four months."

District Attorney Positive.

That was the positive declaration of local District Attorney R. H. Jackson, who with Chief of Detectives E. E. Clark and a force of sleuths is prosecuting the case against Meredith and his associates, who are slated for hearing Tuesday afternoon on charges of malpractise and larceny. He would not say upon what he based his assertion.

Dr. H. E. Lutz, chief informant against Meredith, said that many women—possibly a score—have been traced to Meredith's institution and there lost track of.

Evidence Coming Fast.

"Evidence is coming in every hour," said the district attorney. "By telephone, by letter and by conversation. I will show you the body of Mrs. Myrtle Allison of Wilkinsburg. She died at Meredith's place and was buried in the United cemetery under the name of 'Daisy Davis.'"

Dr. Meredith Rearrested.

Dr. C. C. Meredith of the sanitarium and Miss Lucy D. Orr, a nurse in his employ, arrested a few days ago on an alleged charge of malpractice in connection with the death of Mrs. Allison, a year ago, and released on bail, were rearrested, charged with the woman's murder.

The action followed the exhuming Saturday of the body of a woman buried March, 1913, under the name of Daisy Davis, which was identified as that of Mrs. Allison by her brother.

Mrs. Allison is alleged to have been taken to the sanitarium at Bellevue, a suburb, after an illegal operation Medical records show that a certificate was issued to the sanitarium for the burial of Daisy Davis.

Evidence to prove that Dorothy Arnold was being treated by Dr. Meredith soon after her disappearance, was given to District Attorney R. H. Jackson by one of the most prominent physicians in Pittsburgh.

The information was gleaned from a prominent woman, who was also in the Bellevue house at the same time as was Dorothy Arnold.

Father Makes Denial.

New York.—At the Arnold home here it was denied that Dorothy was here, as declared by District Attorney Jackson. Her father, Francis Arnold reiterated his belief that his daughter is dead. Arnold was infuriated when the statement of District Attorney Jackson was read to him.

DYNAMITE CASE UP AGAIN

Action by United States Courts is Expected on Move to Stay Sentence.

Chicago, April 13.—When the United States circuit court of appeals convenes Tuesday for the April term, it is probable that action will be taken in the cases of 30 labor men who were found guilty of conspiring to transport dynamite in violation of the interstate commerce laws.

A motion for a rehearing in the cases of the six defendants who were granted new trials by the court of appeals is to be pressed by the government and it is expected that a move for a stay will be presented in behalf of the 26 other defendants who face prison sentences.

Counsel for the defendants have prepared a petition for pardon for their clients and it is believed that a stay will be asked at least until the petition receives attention from President Wilson.

Secretary Bryan Plans Vacation.

Washington, April 13. — Secretary Bryan and Mrs. Bryan are planning to leave Washington Tuesday for a short stay at their winter place in Miami, Fla. Mr. Bryan has put in two days of hard work at the state department since his recent illness, but he is weak and has been advised to go south for a complete rest.

Concerned Over Mrs. Wilson.

White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., April 13.—More concerned over the health of Mrs. Wilson than in the surroundings of a fashionable hotel at Easter season, President Wilson spent his first day here with his family, bothered little with the throng of people about. The president could not resist the ties of his college days, however, and at night he and the family accepted the invitation of the Princeton University Glee, Mandolin and Banjo clubs to attend their concert.

NOT HIGH-PLACED AMBITION

Magazine Poet Surely Could Not Be Accused of Having Too Strong Desire for Wealth.

Apropos of Marshall R. Kernochan, who makes $30 a year by writing music, a magazine poet said:

"To make $30 a year out of music is pretty good. It's as much as I, a successful poet, make out of verse.

"When they see my poetry in all the magazines, people think that I live at the Ritz-Carlton. Alas, they don't know the magazine poetry rates.

"A young lady said to me the other day:

"'I like your poetry so much. I have often heard the expression—beautiful as a poet's dream. Tell me, what are poet's dreams like?'

"'Well, my dear young lady,' I replied, 'mine are usually about three square meals a day, clean linen and an occasional five-cent cigar.'"

PIMPLES ALL OVER FACE

1413 E. Genessee Ave., Saginaw, Mich.—"Cuticura Soap and Ointment cured me of a very bad disease of the face without leaving a scar. Pimples broke out all over my face, red and large. They festered and came to a head. They itched and burned and caused me to scratch them and make sores. They said they were seed warts. At night I was restless from itching. When the barber would shave me my face would bleed terribly. Then scabs would form afterwards, then they would drop off and the so-called seed warts would come back again. They were on my face for about nine months and the trouble caused disfigurement while it lasted.

"One day I read in the paper of the Cuticura Soap and Ointment. I received a free sample of Cuticura Soap and Ointment and it was so much value to me that I bought a cake of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment at the drug store. I used both according to directions. In about ten days my face began to heal up. My face is now clear of the warts and not a scar is left." (Signed) LeRoy C. O'Brien, May 12, 1913.

Grape Seed Oil.

Oil from grape seeds has become a byproduct of the wine industry in portions of France, Italy and Wuertemberg. The Bulletin of the American Association of Commerce and Trade, published in Berlin, says that the first pressing, obtained cold, is of edible oil; that extracted by pressing and heating is dark and bitter, and is used for lighting purposes and in the making of soap. It is described oils used in the textile industry. About 2.2 pounds of oil may be expressed from the seeds of grapes yielding 26.42 gallons of wine.

France Honors American Artist.

The French government has purchased for the Luxembourg gallery the original painting by Arthur Rackham of "Jack Spratt and His Wife," one of a series of Rackham pictures now running in St. Nicholas Magazine. This is the highest honor that the French government can confer upon a painting by a living artist. Not until the artist is dead are his canvases eligible for the Louvre.

UPWARD START
After Changing from Coffee to Postum.

Many a talented person is kept back because of the interference of coffee with the nourishment of the body.

This is especially so with those whose nerves are very sensitive, as is often the case with talented persons. There is a simple, easy way to get rid of coffee troubles and a Tenn. lady's experience along these lines is worth considering. She says:

"Almost from the beginning of the use of coffee it hurt my stomach. By the time I was fifteen I was almost a nervous wreck, nerves all unstrung, no strength to endure the most trivial thing, either work or fun.

"There was scarcely anything I could eat that would agree with me. The little I did eat seemed to give me more trouble than it was worth. I was literally starving; was so weak I could not sit up long at a time.

"It was then a friend brought me a hot cup of Postum. I drank part of it and after an hour I felt as though I had had something to eat — felt strengthened. That was about five years ago, and after continuing Postum in place of coffee and gradually getting stronger, today I can eat and digest anything I want, walk as much as I want. My nerves are steady.

"I believe the first thing that did me any good and gave me an upward start, was Postum, and I use it altogether now instead of coffee."

Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum — must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

MINNESOTA STATE NEWS

BEGINS CAMPAIGN AGAINST CHOLERA

MINNESOTA GOVERNOR CALLS ON ENTIRE NORTHWEST TO CO-OPERATE IN WAR.

FIXES "HOG CHOLERA WEEK"

Eberhart Issues Proclamation Setting Aside Eight Days For Concerted Campaign of Education and Enlightenment.

St. Paul, April 11. — A campaign against the terrible hog cholera scourge that cost the farmers of the northwest $60,000,000 last season is to be waged this year. The movement is being gotten under way by Governor A. O. Eberhart, of this state, who hopes to secure the co-operation of the executives of North and South Dakota, Montana, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, Illinois, Michigan and Missouri.

Letters Sent to All.

In a letter sent to the governors of the above mentioned states, it is pointed out that experts are agreed that the disease can only be stamped out by an enlightened public after a thorough understanding of the infection has been gained. As the disease is often carried from one state to another, a concerted action is deemed advisable on the part of the entire Northwest.

Governor Eberhart intends that Minnesota shall lead the way in dealing the death blow to the disease. Consequently, he has set aside the week of April 17 to 25 as "Hog Cholera Week," with the hope that the other Northwestern states may do likewise.

The Proclamation.

The proclamation of Mr. Eberhart follows:

"During the past year the State of Minnesota, with other states, suffered a severe loss through the disease known as hog cholera. The losses in other states have been even greater, entailing a national loss of $60,000,000. A serious loss, not only to the swine breeders of the State, but a tremendous economic loss to the entire public. In view of the present shortage of meat animals throughout the United States, this fact assumes a noteworthy significance which Congress has decognized through the appropriation of $500,000 for the especial purpose of combating further inroads of the disease during the coming summer and fall months. The prevention of similar losses from hog cholera in 1914 is a matter that vitally concerns all the people of the State of Minnesota and it is commonly understood that the disease can only be prevented and stomped out by an enlightened public, through a campaign of education which will give an understanding of the disease, its methods of infection and spread, and its prevention and cure.

"According to the best authorities, hog cholera, a germ disease, spreads through lack of strict quarantine regulations which, if not recognized, will eventually infect all of the hog raising sections of the Northwest. Hog cholera may also become general through lack of understanding of the use of serum-virus treatment, as the use of virus simply means taking live cholera germs to the community. There are a great many infected communities through Minnesota at the present time and it is believed that when warm weather arrives there will be other serious outbreaks of the disease unless the public generally becomes aware of the situation and takes measures to unitedly stamp it out.

How to Stamp Out Scourge.

"The best live stock sanitary authorities of the country will agree that hog cholera may be prevented and stamped out only by following three procedures.

"First, quarantine and thorough disinfection of infected farms and communities.

"Second, by the use of the serum-virus treatment in communities where the disease is known to exist and through a supervision of its use in uninfected communities.

"Third, the strict and efficient cooperation between the hog raisers and neighbors and the public.

"Without this united co-operation no effective progress can be made in fighting the disease. In this connection it is extremely important that carriers of the disease should be excluded from cholera farms and that all sources of infection should become common knowledge.

"These and other matters pertaining to hog cholera are of vital interest to the citizens of Minnesota, and all such citizens should post themselves as to methods of dealing with the present situation.

"In view of these facts, I hereby appoint the week of

APRIL 17TH to 25TH
'HOG CHOLERA WEEK,'

and would urge that all farmers' organizations, by whatever name they may be designated, hold local meetings, at which time they should thoroughly discuss this question and call to their aid the state experimental station, the agricultural press, the daily press, the county press and all other sources of information or means whereby the public may become generally conservant with the present situation.

"United action on the part of farmers and all co-operating agencies is of the utmost importance in dealing with any infectious live stock disease and any measures which may be taken for the enlightenment of the public are most desirable for the effectiveness desired as a result of this statement.

"ADOLPH O. EBERHART,
"Governor."

CORN AND PORK CONTEST

Murray County Leads Movement Unique in Minnesota—$540 in Prizes.

Slayton.—Murray county is pushing the better farming movement by means of a corn and pork contest which is probably unique in the state. The rules provide for no less than fifty-nine prizes of an aggregate value of $540. The smallest prize is $2 and the largest is valued at $65.00

Any boy or girl in Murray county not less than 12 and not more than 20 is qualified to compete for the prizes offered. They are required either to raise a litter of pigs from the time of farrowing until Nov. 15, keeping a careful account of the feeding and care of the hogs or to raise an acre of corn, keeping a careful record of the work and expense, or to raise both the corn and litter of pigs. The highest prize for which the contestant can compete in case only one of the two is engaged in is $15. However, if the contestant raises both corn and pork he is in line for the grand first prize valued at $65.

The leaders in this movement have been Professor R. F. Grim, director of agriculture in the Slayton high school, and J. K. Campbell, a breeder of Poland China swine. These two, respectively secretary and chairman of the organization, with F. D. Weck, the treasurer, have assumed the chief responsibility. With B. I. Weld, R. F. Lamb, P. J. Nelson, Robert B. Forrest, P. H. Harrington, Superintendent D. S. Brainerd and others, they were influenced to promote this contest because of the educational advantages of the Murray county corn contest which has ben so successfully carried on for two years. They believe in the expansion of the contest principle and the increase in the premium list from $40 to $540 must necessarily result in educational and pecuniary advantages to the community.

That the educational value is recognized is shown by the offer of the Slayton high school to grant credits to those students who enter and successfully complete this contest.

That the contest has the hearty cooperation of the entire county is demonstrated by the fact that the commissioners appropriated $100. It is also shown by the receipt of unsolicited contributions from farmers and farmers' clubs.

The contestant must report to the committee before determining the yield of corn and before weighing the pigs.

Blue Grass in Wadena Co-operate.

Wadena.—A co-operative creamery has been started at Blue Grass, a small station just north of Wadena, with fifty patrons. New creameries and cheese factories are constantly being opened in Wadena county.

To Elude Curious Crowds.

St. Paul, April 9.—Martin Flanagan and Fred Turner, former police officials of St. Paul, found guilty of accepting bribes for protection from disorderly women and sentenced to the state prison for indeterminate periods not to exceed 10 years, were not taken to Stillwater Tuesday night as was anticipated. It was stated that in order to avoid a curious crowd certain to gather to see the prisoners on their way to the penitentiary the journey would be made at night and at an unexpected hour.

Claims of No-License Men.

No-license forces make the claim, however, that while they have held the liquor supporters even in most of the towns which were already dry, they have made inroads in what was previously staunch liquor territory. In support of this contention they point to the towns of St. Peter, Canby, Benson,, Pipestone, Tracy, Marshall Madison and Luverne, in which the saloons were repudiated, and which have heretofore been classed as wet strongholds.

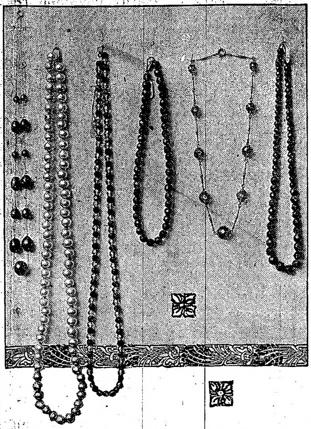
There are cattle to the value of $20,000 yet to be disposed of this month.

Beads and Still More Beads



If you have beads, new fashioned or old fashioned, big or little, of any sort or description, bring them out, for now is the day of their triumph. A visit to the largest stores, and to the jewelers, discloses beads from all quarters of the globe, and from crude barbarous looking strands to finely cut gems and matched pearls. Every one is wearing beads, or wants to wear them. They are shown in endless variety and are a big feature in the new season's fashions.

Since they may be had in all colors it is quite the smartest thing to do to have them match the color of the costume or else to provide a very striking contrast to it. And as all the shades of yellow are given greater prominence than other colors, it follows that amber beads lead the gay procession of bead trappings.

After amber, either clear or cloudy, jet is probably more worn than any other single kind of bead. Short strands of fine and beautifully cut jet beads are round, graduated in size, and cut with many facets. Long or short strands of medium sized beads made of jet and amber in the same size, strung alternately, rank with the all amber, and all jet varieties in popularity.

Long strands of large pearl beads are chosen for wear with evening dress. They seem to belong to the scheme of things here. Satin veiled with chiffon, filmy laces and pale elusive colors suggest them. Amber and jet one sees everywhere on the street. Amethyst beads, in short strands, are worn as the short strands of amber beads are, on any occasion the wearer may choose.

Besides these familiar beads there are others which are becoming familiar rapidly enough. Among them the most striking is the vivid scarlet bead of opaque cut glass which is worn with visiting gowns or evening dress. It will look well with linen dresses in white or natural color, or in the half bleached tones. This variety is a new-comer and is gaining ground as a promising novelty.

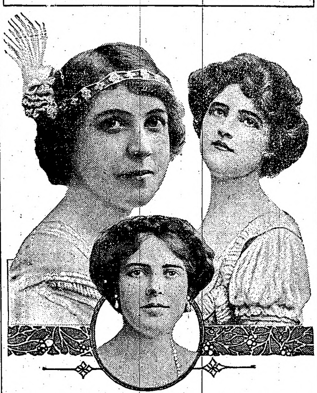
Individual Styles in Hair Dressing



Some women discover after experimenting that a certain definite style of hair dressing suits them better than any other. When this discovery has been made it is a mistake to adopt every new idea that comes along, at the expense of becomingness.

The lady with serene, broad, low brow and straight eyebrows may emphasize these gifts of nature by a coiffure like that portrayed in the lower one of the three pictures given here. It suits the character of her face exactly, and suggests a serene and beautiful personality. Besides, it is a style that is good for a lifetime. If Fashion demands a high coiffure, she may vary the arrangement of the back hair, but preserve the front parting and uncovered brow, with small change in the general effect.

For the girl with a vivacious face, and narrow, high forehead, a good arrangement of the hair is shown in the figure at the right hand. A soft pompadour of loosely waved hair held in place by a support, if needed, in the shape of a small hair roll, allows the hair to be brought down over the forehead at the sides. The back hair may be placed anywhere; in a coil at the crown of the head, as shown in the picture, at the nape of the neck, or on top of the head, without changing the becomingness of the coiffure.

Nearly all youthful faces, of whatever type, find the coiffure parted at the side a becoming arrangement for the hair. It is shown in the left hand picture adorned with a hair ornament for evening wear. The style is so plain that it needs the addition of an ornamental band, or two bands in the Greek fashion, at any time. Also, it is next to impossible to keep the hair in position at the front without the aid of these bands or ornaments. No support can be worn under the hair in this style, and the natural hair is, like its owner, "prone to wander."

Small supports of various shapes are really essential to successful hair-dressing, except when nature has been exceptionally bountiful in the matter of a natural growth of hair.

Chicago, Ill.—"I must thank you with all my heart for Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I used to go to my doctor for pills and remedies and they did not help me. I had headaches and could not eat, and the doctor claimed I had female trouble and must have an operation. I read in the paper about Lydia E. Hygienic Salts for the Bath.

A physician who believes in baths as a tonic advises the use of Epsom or Carlsbad salts—preferably the former—for a general invigoration. They should be used not more than twice a week.

Take one ounce of the salts to a pint of warm water for a sponge bath. For a large tub bath use a pint of salts to a tub of warm water.

Purchase the salts at a wholesale drug house. The usual price in quantities is four cents a pound. This salt water makes an excellent tonic and carries off many impurities through the pores of the skin.

Phones for Turkey.

The Anglo-French Telephone company, which secured a concession from the Turkish government for Constantinople three years ago, has completed its installation, and the official inauguration of the public service has just taken place. About 28,000 miles of wires have been laid. This includes eight submarine cables under the Bosphorus, the Golden Horn, and the Gulf of Ismid. There are already 4,000 subscribers. The operators are all native girls—Greeks, Armenians and Jewesses, and even seven Turkish girls.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

John A. Duffy, of Red Lake Falls has announced his candidacy for Representative, which we publish in another column with his platform. We like the ring of the first plank in his platform, wherein he says:

"Legislation for economy and efficiency in State Administration of business affairs for the purpose of lightening the burden of the present high taxes."

Mr. Duffy is a man who, well understands the extravagance of the present administration of affairs of this state and the need of radical reform, and as he is largely interested in realestate he is one of the tax payers, who will stand on that plank after he is elected. The farmers can depend on it, that John A. Duffy will not be ruled by politicians of St. Paul and Minneapolis, but will well and truly look after the best interests of this District.

Beware of the business houses that never advises you to use the parcel post instead of the old out of date express companies, as they have an ax to grind, and you are turning the crank. Do as we done with a concern in Minneapolis. We ordered a ten pound package from them to be sent by parcel post. They sent it by express, we wrote them that we had not ordered anything from them by express, refused to accept the express, compelled them to recall it, and ship it to us by parcel post. The next time we ordered anything from that house it came by parcel post.

The frost has injured the fruit crop to some extent in the southern states, but we won't hear just how bad until the fruit dealer is selling us a box of apples next fall for $2.25 that the producer got 40 cents for. But the parcel post man is after them ducks, and the producer of potatoes will soon be able to exchange with the producer of peaches, without building up a row of middle men into millionaires between the potato patch and fruit orchard.

Read over the political announcements that are published in your local papers, and then make up your mind which one you will vote for. If you see a man's name on the ticket that has not asked you for your vote just consider that he thinks he does not need any of your assistance, so do not vote for him.

The Progressive party of ex-republican are preparing to put a full state ticket into the field with the "plow man" from Ottertail County as leader.

The spring is rather backward this year, but the cold April weather extends as far south as the north line of Florida, so we have no particular kick coming in northern Minnesota.

Our rate is $5.00 for a short political announcement. If you want to tell the people what you have been doing and expect to do in the future, 5 cents a line will be the rate to the June Primaries.

We are having a nice shower of rain to day which will settle the ground and start the green grass to growing.

Invitations are out for a wedding reception of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Swanson to be held at their home on Saturday evening.

The ice moved out of Red Lake River Wednesday the 15th, and we were pleased to bid it good bye for this year.

A number of farmers commenced harrowing this week, and if the present pleasant weather continues, seeding will be in full blast next week.

Arthur Toupin and John Peterson, the former Register and Receiver of the U. S. Land Office at Crookston are now owners of The First State Bank of Oklee.

Again we call the attention of some of the homesteaders, to be sure and not let their seven years run out before making application to make final proof.

There are a few fish in the river this spring, but it will take several years for them to get as plentiful as they were before the great Lumber Co. slaughter.

It appears that no one wants the sheriff's, auditor's, Clerk of Court's, or Register of Deeds' offices, but two candidates have signified their willingness to take care of the county's funds.

We have changed from having our weekly shipment of papers come by express and now have them come by parcel post. The expense is a little more but the better service more than compensates for the extra expense.

We understand that John Peterson of Oklee, former Receiver of the U. S. Land Office at Crookston, has been appointed U. S. Commissioner, and that final proofs can now be taken before him at Oklee.

The Thief River Falls Times says that the County Option plank in John A. Duffy's platform is not definate enough. It is plain enough to satisfy anyone who is not looking for trouble, and the Times don't cut much ice anyhow in a political scrap.

At the request of some of the county optionists, C. L. Hanson has indorsed that plank in his platform. Some of the people who want the legislature to put booze out of their way, because they can't let it alone when it is in their reach, are very anxious to have a county option law passed. Well C. L. has promised to vote for it, and it never did make any difference to us how a member voted on this question, as we always could attend to our own business without any help from the legislature.

Now is the time of year that the farmers should attend to it to turn over their meadow lands, and particulary those on which the hay was not cut last year. If you see a crooked necked yap around telling you not to set out any fires, tell him to go soak his head, as you propose to burn over your own meadow lands. That state fire warden business has been thousands of dollars damage to the eleven townships by preventing people from burning over meadow lands, where burning is a necessity in order to cut the hay from the lands. We have burnt over all of our meadow lands and if you happen to see Mr. State Fire Warden tell him we set the fire.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

To the Voters of the new 65th District, composed of the Counties of Pennington, Clearwater and Red Lake:

I hereby announce myself as a candidate for Representative for the said district. I solicit your support and votes at the primaries to be held June 16th, 1914.

I have been a resident of the District for the past thirty-two years and have I believe, grown to know the wants and needs of the citizens of the district, and as political platforms have been eliminated by the Non-Partisan Election Law, I therefore hold it to be the duty of all persons seeking legislative honors to declare themselves upon public questions affecting the welfare, health and morals of the people of the State

If nominated and elected, I pledge myself to use my best efforts and ability to work for the following legislation:

Legislation for economy and efficiency in State Administration of business affairs for the purpose of lightening the burden of the present high taxes.

I favor putting the telephones of the state under the supervision of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission and compelling physical connection of lines and regulation of rates.

I shall encourage the adoption of the Revolving Fund Amendment, known as House File No. 1242. Also the Initiative Referendum Amendment.

Equal suffrage for women.

I favor the sale of foreign bonds held by the State of Minnesota, and the investment of the permanent funds of the State in improving our own state, instead of loaning them to other states at a low rate of interest. The money should be used to finance our Counties, Cities, Drainage Projects, School Districts and Loans on Resident Farm Property.

I favor the increase in the royalties paid the State when the present mineral leases expire.

I favor Consolidation and Reduction of the State Board Commissions in the interests of economy.

I favor the submission of the liquor question to the vote of the people, to the end that communities where they are of the opinion that right living and higher morals may be attained by the elimination of liquor, may at least have an opportunity of putting their views to the test.

I also favor liberal allowances for advertising the resources of the State with a view of reducing immigration.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of the condition in the rural communities.

Hoping you will give my platform due consideration and favor me with your franchise, I am most

Respectfully,
JOHN A. DUFFY.

Weather Reduced to Prose.

The weather was once a picturesque and poetic thing. It came up in the night with a boom and a bang through the trees. It was a sort of mystic king that asked no questions, but just swung a scepter. It was grand in "red sky at night, the sailor's delight; red sky in the morning, sailors take warning." It was a wholesome lesson to proud man that he always had a master, and it made us more reverent toward nature and the Creator. There was such a difference in receiving our weather direct from heaven and receiving it by wire direct from Washington.—New York Mail.

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in a road house near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city and identifies the body. A young woman who accompanied Wrandall to the inn and subsequently disappeared, is suspected. Wrandall, it appears, had led a gay life and neglected his wife. Mrs. Wrandall starts back for New York in an auto during a blinding snow storm. On the way she meets a young woman in the road who proves to be the woman who killed Wrandall.

CHAPTER II.—Continued.

"There was nothing left for me to do but that."

"And why did you rob him?"

"Ah, I had ample time to think of all that. You may tell the officers they will find everything hidden in that farmhouse cellar. God knows I do not want them. I am not a thief. I'm not so bad as that."

Mrs. Wrandall marveled. "Not so bad as that!" And she was a murderess, a wanton!

"You are hungry. You must be famished."

"No, I am not hungry. I have not thought of food." She said it in such a way that the other knew what her whole mind had been given over to since the night before.

A fresh impulse seized her. "You shall have food and a place where you can sleep—and rest," she said. "Now please don't say anything more. I do not want to know too much. The least you say tonight, the better for—for both of us."

With that she devoted all of her attention to the car, increasing the speed considerably. Far ahead she could see twinkling, will-o'-the-wisp lights, the first signs of thickly populated districts. They were still eight or ten miles from the outskirts of the city and the way was arduous. She was conscious of a sudden feeling of fatigue. The chill of the night seemed to have made itself felt with abrupt, almost stupefying force. She wondered if she could keep her strength, her courage—her nerves.

The girl was English. Mrs. Wrandall was convinced of the fact, almost immediately. Unmistakably English and apparently of the cultivated type. In fact, the peculiarities of speech that determines the London show-girl or music-hall character were wholly lacking. Her voice, her manner, even under such trying conditions, were characteristic of the English woman of cultivation. Despite the dreadful strain under which she labored, there were evidences of that curious serenity which marks the English woman of the better classes; an inborn composure, a calm orderliness of the emotions. Mrs. Wrandall was conscious of a sense of surprise, of a wonder that increased as her thoughts evolved themselves into something less chaotic than they were at the time of contact with this visible condition.

For a mile or more she sent the car along with reckless disregard for comfort or safety. Her mind was groping for something tangible in the way of intentions. What was she to do with this creature? What was to become of her? At what street corner should she turn her adrift? The idea of handing her over to the police did not enter her thoughts for an instant. Somehow she felt that the girl was a stranger to the city. She could not explain the feeling, yet it was with her and very persistent. Of course, there was a home of some sort, or lodgings, or friends, but would he girl dare show herself in familiar haunts?

She found herself wondering why the poor wretch had not made way with herself. Escape seemed out of the question. That must have been clear to her from the beginning, else why was she going back there to give herself up? What better way out of it than self-destruction. She would advise the girl to leave the car when they reached the center of a certain bridge that spanned the river! No one would find her. . . . .

Even as the thought took shape in her mind, she experienced a great sense of awe, so overwhelming that she cried out with the horror of it. She turned her head for a quick glance at the mute, wretched face showing white above the robe, and her heart ached with sudden pity for her. The thought of that slender, alive thing going down to the icy waters—her soul turned sick with the dread of it!

In that instant, Sara Wrandall—no philanthropist, no sentimentalist—made up her mind to give this erring one more than an even chance for salvation. She would see her safely across that bridge and many others. God had directed the footsteps of this girl so that she should fall in with the one best qualified to pass judgment on her. It was in that person's power to save her or destroy her. The commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," took on a broader meaning as she considered the power that was hers; the power to kill.

A great relaxation came over Sara Wrandall. It was as if every nerve, every muscle in her body had reached the snapping point and suddenly had given way. For a moment her hands were weak and powerless; her head fell forward. In an instant she conquered—but only partially—the strange feeling of lassitude. Then she realized how tired she was, how fiercely the strain had told on her body and brain, how much she had really suffered.

Her blurred eyes turned once more for a look at the girl, who sat there, just as she had been sitting for miles, her white face standing out with almost unnatural clearness, and as rigid as that of a sphinx.

The girl spoke. "Do they hang women in this country?"

Mrs. Wrandall started. "In some of the states," she replied, and was unable to account for the swift impulse to evade.

"But in this state?" persisted the other, almost without a movement of the lips.

"They send them to the electric chair—sometimes," said Mrs. Wrandall.

There was a long silence between them, broken finally by the girl.

"You have been very kind to me, madam. I have no means of expressing my gratitude. I can only say that I shall bless you to my dying hour. May I trouble you to set me down at the bridge? I remember crossing one. I shall be able to—"

"No!" cried Mrs. Wrandall shrilly, divining the other's intention at once. "You shall not do that. I, too, thought of that as a way out of it for you, but—no, it must not be that. Give me a few minutes to think. I will find a way."

The girl turned toward her. Her eyes were burning.

"Do you mean that you will help me to get away?" she cried, slowly, incredulously.

"Let me think!"

"You will lay yourself liable—"

"Let me think, I say."

"But I mean to surrender myself to—"

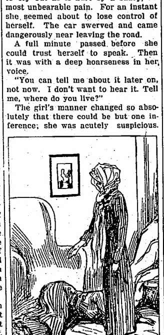
"An hour ago you meant to do it, but what were you thinking of ten minutes ago? Not surrender. You were thinking of the bridge. Listen to me now: I am sure that I can save you. I do not know all the—all the circumstances connected with your association with—with that man back there at the inn. Twenty-four hours passed before they were able to identify him. It is not unlikely that tomorrow may put them in possession of the name of the woman who went with him to that place. They do not know it tonight, of that I am positive. You covered your trail too well. But you must have been seen with him during the day or the night—"

The other broke in eagerly: "I don't believe any one knows that I—that I went out there with him. He arranged it very—carefully. Oh, what a beast he was!" The bitterness of that wail caused the woman beside her to cry out as if hurt by a sharp, almost unbearable pain. For an instant she seemed about to lose control of herself. The car swerved and came dangerously near leaving the road.

A full minute passed before she could trust herself to speak. Then it was with a deep hoarseness in her voice.

"You can tell me about it later on, not now. I don't want to hear it. Tell me, where do you live?"

The girl's manner changed so absolutely that there could be but one inference; she was acutely suspicious.



She Sank to the Floor in a Heap.

Her lips tightened and her figure seemed to stiffen in the seat.

"Where do you live?" repeated the other sharply.

"Why should I tell you that? I do not know you. You—"

"You are afraid of me?"

"Oh, I don't know what to say, or what to do," came from the lips of the hunted one. "I have no friends, no one to turn to, no one to help me. You—you can't be so heartless as to lead me on and then give me up to—God help me, I—I should not be made to suffer for what I have done. If you only knew the circumstances. If you only knew—"

"Stop!" cried the other, in agony.

The girl was bewildered. "You are so strange. I don't understand—"

"We have but two or three miles to go," interrupted Mrs. Wrandall. "We must think hard and—rapidly. Are you willing to come with me to my hotel? You will be safe there for the present. Tomorrow we can plan something for the future."

"If I can only find a place to rest for a little while," began the other. "I shall be busy all day, you will not be disturbed. But leave the rest to me. I shall find a way."

It was nearly three o'clock when she brought the car to a stop in front of a small, exclusive hotel not far from Central park. The street was dark and the vestibule was but dimly lighted. No attendant was in sight.

"Slip into this," commanded Mrs. Wrandall, beginning to divest herself of her own fur coat. "It will cover your muddy garments. I am quite warmly dressed. Don't worry. Be quick. For the time being you are my guest here. You will not be questioned. No one need know who you are. It will not matter if you look distressed. You have just heard of the dreadful thing that has happened to me. You—"

"Happened to you?" cried the girl, drawing the coat about her.

"A member of my family has died. They know it in the hotel by this time. I was called to the death bed—tonight. That is all you will have to know."

"Oh, I am sorry—"

"Come, let us go in. When we reach my rooms, you may order food and drink. You must do it, not I. Please try to remember that it is I who am suffering, not you."

A sleepy night watchman took them up in the elevator. He was not even interested. Mrs. Wrandall did not speak, but leaned rather heavily on the arm of her companion. The door had no sooner closed behind them when the girl collapsed. She sank to the floor in a heap.

"Get up!" commanded her hostess sharply. This was not the time for soft, persuasive words. "Get up at once. You are young and strong. You must show the stuff you are made of now if you ever mean to show it. I cannot help you if you quail."

The girl looked up piteously, and then struggled to her feet. She stood before her protectress, weaving like a frail reed in the wind, pallid to the lips.

"I beg your pardon," she murmured. "I will not give way like that again. I dare say I am faint. I have had no food, no rest—but never mind that now. Tell me what I am to do. I will try to obey."

"First of all, get out of those muddy, frozen things you have on."

Mrs. Wrandall herself moved stiffly and with unsteady limbs as she began to remove her own outer garments. The girl mechanically followed her example. She was a pitiable object in the strong light of the electrolier. Muddy from head to foot, water-stained and bedraggled, her face streaked with dirt, she was the most unattractive creature one could well imagine.

These women, so strangely thrown together by Fate, maintained an unbroken silence during the long, fumbling process of partial disrobing. They scarcely looked at one another, and yet they were acutely conscious of the interest each felt in the other. The grateful warmth of the room, the abrupt transition from gloom and cheerlessness to comfortable obscurity, had a more pronounced effect on the stranger than on her hostess.

"It is good to feel warm once more," she said, an odd timidness in her manner. "You are very good to me."

They were sitting in Mrs. Wrandall's bedchamber, just off the little sitting-room. Three or four trunks stood against the walls.

"I dismissed my maid on landing. She robbed me," said Mrs. Wrandall, voicing the relief that was uppermost in her mind. She opened a closet door and took out a thick eider-down robe, which she tossed across a chair. "Now call up the office and say that you are speaking for me. Say to them that I must have something to eat, no matter what the hour may be. I will get out some clean underwear for you, and— Oh, yes; if they ask about me, say that I am cold and ill. That is sufficient. Here is the bath. Please be as quick about it as possible."

Moving as if in a dream, the girl did as she was told. Twenty minutes later there was a knock at the door. A waiter appeared with a tray and service table. He found Mrs. Wrandall lying back in a chair, attended by a slender young woman in a pink eider-down dressing-gown, who gave hesitating directions to him. Then he was dismissed with a handsome tip, produced by the same young woman.

"You are not to return for these things," she said as he went out.

In silence she ate and drank, her hostess looking on with gloomy interest. It was no shock to Mrs. Wrandall to find that the girl, who was no more than twenty-two or three, possessed unusual beauty. Her great eyes were blue—the lovely Irish blue—her skin was fair and smooth, her features regular and of the delicate mold that defines the well-bred gentlewoman at a glance. Her hair, now in order, was dark and thick and lay softly about her small ears and neck. She was not surprised, I repeat, for she had never known Challis Wrandall to show interest in any but the most attractive of her sex. She found herself smiling bitterly as she looked.

But who may know the thoughts of the other occupant of that little sitting-room? Who can put herself in the place of that despairing, hunted creature who knew that blood was on the hands with which she ate, and whose eyes were filled with visions of the death-chair?

So great was her fatigue that long before she finished the meal her tired lids began to droop, her head to nod in spasmodic surrenders to an overpowering desire for sleep. Suddenly she dropped the fork from her fingers and sank back in the comfortable chair, her head resting against the soft, upholstered back. Her lids fell, her hands dropped to the arms of the chair. A fine line appeared between her dark eyebrows—indicative of pain.

For many minutes Sara Wrandall watched the haggardness deepen in the face of the unconscious sleeper. Then, even as she wondered at the act, she went over and took up one of the slim hands in her own. The hand of an aristocrat! It lay limp in hers, and helpless. Long, tapering fingers and delicately pink with the return of warmth.

Rousing herself from the mute contemplation of her charge, she shook the girl's shoulder. Instantly she was awake and staring, alarm in her dazed, bewildered eyes.

"You must go to bed," said Mrs. Wrandall quietly. "Don't be afraid. No one will think of coming here."

The girl rose. As she stood before her benefactress, she heard her murmur as if from afar-off: "Just about your size and figure," and wondered not a little.

"You may sleep late. I have many things to do and you will not be disturbed. Come, take off your clothes and get into my bed. Tomorrow we will plan further—"

"But, madam," cried the girl, "I cannot take your bed. Where are you to—"

"If I feel like lying down, I shall lie there beside you."

The girl stared. "Lie beside me?"

"Yes. Oh, I am not afraid of you, child. You are not a monster. You are just a poor, tired—"

"Oh, please don't! Please!" cried the other, tears rushing to her eyes. She raised Mrs. Wrandall's hand to her lips and covered it with kisses.

Long after she went to sleep, Sara Wrandall stood beside the bed, looking down at the pain-stricken face, and tried to solve the problem that suddenly had become a part of her very existence.

"It is not friendship," she argued, fiercely. "It is not charity, it is not humanity. It's the debt I owe, that's all. She did the thing for me that I could not have done myself because I loved him. I owe her something for that."

Later on she turned her attention to the trunks. Her decision was made. With ruthless hands she dragged gown after gown from the "innovations" and cast them over chairs, on the floor, across the foot of the bed; smart things from Paris and Vienna; ball gowns, tea gowns, lingerie, blouses, hats, gloves and all of the countless things that a woman of fashion and goes abroad for that purpose and no means indulges herself in when she other to speak of. From the closets she drew forth New York "tailor-suits" and other garments.

Until long after six o'clock she busied herself over this huge pile of costly raiment, portions of which she had worn but once or twice, some not at all, selecting certain dresses, hats, stockings, etc., each of which she laid carelessly aside; an imposing pile of many hues, all bright and gay and glittering. In another heap she laid the somber things of black; a meager assortment as compared to the other.

Then she stood back and surveyed the two heaps with tired eyes, a curious, almost scornful smile on her lips. "There!" she said with a sigh. "The black pile is mine, the gay pile is yours," she went on, turning toward the sleeping girl. "What a travesty!"

Then she gathered up the soiled garments her charge had worn and cast them into the bottom of a trunk, which she locked. Laying out a carefully selected assortment of her own garments for the girl's use when she arose, Mrs. Wrandall sat down beside the bed and waited, knowing that sleep would not come to her.

CHAPTER III.

Hetty Castleton.

At half past six she went to the telephone and called for the morning newspapers. At the same time she asked that a couple of district messenger boys be sent to her room with the least possible delay. The hushed, scared voice of the telephone girl downstairs convinced her that news of the tragedy was abroad; she could imagine the girl looking at the headlines with awed eyes even as she responded to the call from room 416, and her shudder as she realized that it was the wife of the dead man speaking.

One of the night clerks, pale and agitated, came up with the papers. Without as much as a glance at the headlines, she tossed the papers on the table. "I have sent for two messenger boys. It is too early to accomplish much by telephone, I fear. Will you be so kind as to telephone at seven o'clock or a little after to my apartment?—You will find the number under Mr. Wrandall's name. Please inform the butler or his wife that they may expect me by ten o'clock, and that I shall bring a friend with me—a young lady. Kindly have my motor sent to Haffner's garage, and looked after. When the reporters come, as they will, please say to them that I will see them at my own home at eleven o'clock."

The clerk, considerably relieved, took his departure in some haste, and she was left with the morning papers, each of which she scanned rapidly. The details, of course, were meager. There was a double-leaded account of her visit to the inn and her extraordinary return to the city. Her chief interest, however, did not rest in these particulars, but in the speculations of the authorities as to the identity of the mysterious woman—and her whereabouts. There was the likelihood that she was not the only one who had encountered the girl on the highway or in the neighborhood of the inn. So far as she could glean from the reports, however, no one had seen the girl, nor was there the slightest hint offered as to her identity. The papers of the previous afternoon had published lurid accounts of the murder, with all of the known details, the name of the victim at that time still being a mystery. She remembered reading the story with no little interest. The only new feature in the case, therefore, was the identification of Challis Wrandall by his "beautiful wife," and the sensational manner in which it had been brought about. With considerable interest she noted the hour that these dispatches had been received from "special correspondents," and wondered where the shrewd, lynx-eyed reporters napped while she was at the inn. All of the dispatches were timed three o'clock and each paper characterized its issue as an "Extra," with Challis Wrandall's name in huge type across as many columns as the dignity of the sheet permitted.

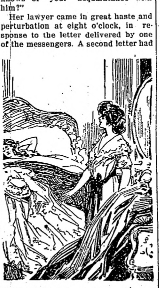
Not a word of the girl! Absolute mystery!

Mrs. Wrandall returned to her post beside the bed of the sleeper in the adjoining room. Deliberately she placed the newspaper on a chair near the girl's pillow, and then raised the window shades to let in the hard gray light of early morn.

It was not her present intention to arouse the wan stranger, who slept as one dead. So gentle was her breathing that the watcher stared in some fear at the fair, smooth breast that seemed scarcely to rise and fall. For a long time she stood beside the bed, looking down at the face of the sleeper, a troubled expression in her eyes.

"I wonder how many times you were seen with him, and where, and by whom," were the questions that ran in a single strain through her mind "Where do you come from? Where did you meet him? Who is there that knows of your acquaintance with him?"

Her lawyer came in great haste and perturbation at eight o'clock, in response to the letter delivered by one of the messengers. A second letter had gone by like means to her husband's brother, Leslie Wrandall, instructing him to break the news to his father and mother and to come to her apartment after he had attended to the removal of the body to the family home near Washington square. She made it quite plain that she did not want Challis Wrandall's body to lie under the roof that sheltered her.



"The Black Pile Is Mine, the Gay Pile Is Yours!"

His family had resented their marriage. Father, mother and sister had objected to her from the beginning, not because she was unworthy, but because her tradespeople ancestry was not so remote as his. She found a curious sense of pleasure in returning to them the thing they prized so highly and surrendered to her with such bitterness of heart. She had not been good enough for him; that was their attitude. Now she was returning him to them, as one would return an article that had been tested and found to be worthless. She would have no more of him!

Carroll, her lawyer, an elderly man of vast experience, was not surprised to find her quite calm and reasonable. He had come to know her very well in the past few years. He had been her father's lawyer up to the time of that excellent tradesman's demise, and he had settled the estate with such unusual dispatch that the heirs—there were many of them—regarded him as an admirable person and—kept him busy ever afterward straigtening out their own affairs. Which goes to prove that policy is often better than honesty.

"I quite understand, my dear, that while it is a dreadful shock to you, you are perfectly reconciled to the—er—to the—well, I might say the culmination of his troubles," said Mr. Carroll tactfully, after she had related for his benefit the story of the night's adventure, with reservation concerning the girl who slumbered in the room beyond.

"Hardly that, Mr. Carroll. Resigned, perhaps. I can't say that I am reconciled. All my life I shall feel that I have been cheated," she said.

He looked up sharply. Something in her tone puzzled him. "Cheated, my dear? Oh, I see. Cheated out of years and years of happiness. I see."

She bowed her head. Neither spoke for a full minute.

"It's a horrible thing to say, Sara, but this tragedy does away with another and perhaps more unpleasant alternative; the divorce I have been urging you to consider for so long."

"Yes, we are spared all that," she said. Then she met his gaze with a sudden flash of anger in her eyes. "But I would not have divorced him—never. You understood that, didn't you?"

"You couldn't have gone on for ever, my dear child, enduring the—"

She stopped him with a sharp exclamation. "Why discuss it now? Let the past take care of itself, Mr. Carroll. The past came to an end night before last, so far as I am concerned. I want advice for the future, not for the past."

He drew back, hurt by her manner. She was quick to see that she had offended him.

"I beg your pardon, my best of friends," she cried earnestly.

He smiled. "If you will take present advice, Sara, you will let go of yourself for a spell and see if tears won't relieve the tension under—"

"Tears!" she cried. "Why should I give way to tears? What have I to weep for? That man up there in the country? The cold, dead thing that spent its last living moments without a thought of love for me? Ah, no, my friend; I shed all my tears while he was alive. There are none left to be shed for him now. He exacted his full share of them. It was his pleasure to wring them from me because he knew I loved him. She leaned forward and spoke slowly, distinctly, so that he would never forget the words. "But listen to me, Mr. Carroll. You also know that I loved him. Can you believe me when I say to you that I hate that dead thing up there in Barton's inn as no one ever hated before? Can you understand what I mean? I hate that dead body, Mr. Carroll. I loved the life that was in it. It was the life of him that I loved, the warm, appealing life of him. It has gone out. Some one less amiable than I suffered at his hands and—well, that is enough. I hate the dead body she left behind her, Mr. Carroll."

The lawyer wiped the cool moisture from his brow.

"I think I understand," he said, but he was filled with wonder. "Extraordinary! Ahem! I should say—Ahem! Dear me! Yes, yes—I've never really thought of it in that light."

"I dare say you haven't," she said, lying back in the chair as if suddenly exhausted.

"By the way, my dear, have you breakfasted?"

"No. I hadn't given it a thought. Perhaps it would be better if I had some coffee—"

"I will ring for a waiter," he said, springing to his feet.

"Not now, please. I have a young friend in the other room—a guest who arrived last night. She will attend to it when she awakes. Poor thing, it has been dreadfully trying for her."

"Good heaven, I should think so," said he, with a glance at the closed door. "Is she asleep?"

"Yes. I shall not call her until you have gone."

"May I inquire—"

"A girl I met recently—an English girl," said she succinctly, and forthwith changed the subject. "There are a few necessary details that must be attended to, Mr. Carroll. That is why I sent for you at this early hour. Mr. Leslie Wrandall will take charge—Ah!" she straightened up suddenly. "What a farce it is going to be!"

Nature's Wise Process.

In the case of all fish which take care of their young, a curious adaptation of natural law to circumstances is found. Those which take the greatest pains and care in sheltering their offspring have the fewest eggs, perhaps less than 100 at a lay, while, on the other hand, species of fish which pay not the slightest attention to their young produce hundreds of thousands, and even millions of eggs at a single lay

Good Cheer Aids Digestion of Food

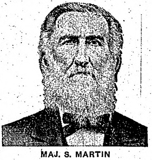
Dyspeptics Can Make the Rest of the Family Happy by Using a Laxative-Tonic.

The temper of the family and the good cheer around the table depend so much on the good digestion of each individual present that the experiences of some former dyspeptics who overcame their trouble should be of interest to those now suffering in this way.

The best advice one can give—but it is advice that is seldom heeded—is to eat slowly and masticate each mouthful carefully. However, if slow eating and careful mastication fail the next aid is one close to nature, Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. This remedy is an excellent digestant, and in addition to helping in the digestion of the food, acts gently on the liver and bowels, ridding them of the accumulation of waste that should long ago have been passed off. It is safe, reliable, pleasant-tasting, and results are guaranteed.

Maj. S. Martin, of Joplin, Mo., now 77, thinks Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin has helped him to a longer and happier life. He has not felt so good in years as he has since taking this excellent medicine, and in spite of his 77 years he says he feels like a boy.

It is the ideal remedy for indigestion, no matter how severe; constipation, no matter how chronic, biliousness, headaches, gas on the stomach, drowsiness after eating and similar annoyances.



MAJ. S. MARTIN

You can obtain Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin at any drug store for fifty cents or one dollar, the latter size being bought by heads of families already familiar with its merits. Results are always guaranteed or money will be refunded.

When you use Syrup Pepsin you will see the fallacy of chewing mints and tablets or of taking cathartics, salts, pills and similar drastic medicines. Unlike these, Syrup Pepsin does not lose its good effect, and by automatically training the stomach and bowel muscles to do their work, soon restores these organs to normal.

Families wishing to try a free sample bottle can obtain it postpaid by addressing Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 203 Washington St., Monticello, Ill. A postal card with your name and address on it will do.

TOAD A VALUABLE SERVANT

Its Uses in the World Have Not Been Accorded the Recognition It Has Long Deserved.

Few well-meaning creatures have been more thoroughly misunderstood that the homely, meditative and retiring toad.

Formerly the toad was considered a venomous reptile, but in our day its habits have been more carefully observed and its great value to the pomologist and gardener has been fully established on account of its propensity for destroying insects.

We should, therefore, cultivate the friendship and assistance of the insectivorous reptiles, including the striped snake, as well as that of birds.

Every tidy housewife detests the cockroach, mice and other vermin. Two or three domesticated toads would keep the coast clear of these and would be found more desirable than a cat, as they are wholly free from trespassing on the rights of man as does the cat. The toad is possessed of a timid and retiring nature, loving dark corners and shady places, but under kind treatment becoming quite tame.

Many instances might be cited of pet toads remaining several years in a family and doing most valuable service with no other compensation than that of immunity from persecution.

In Europe toads are carried to the cities to market and are purchased by the horticulturists, who by their aid are enabled to keep in check the multiplication of the insect tribes which prey upon their fruits, flowers, etc.

Modern Morals.

Senator Joseph E. Ransdell was talking in Washington about his bill for the abolition of divorce.

"The bill's object?" he said. "It's object is, of course, to reduce immorality, loose thinking, loose speaking."

Senator Ransdell smiled and added: "Don't take it too seriously—but here is an episode that throws a light on modern morals.

"A business man came home unexpectedly one morning and found his little son busy at his wife's dressing table.

"'What on earth are you doing there, my lad?' he asked.

"'I'm mixing powdered quinine with mother's face powder,' the youngster answered. 'She's going motoring with Mr. Smith. Won't she taste bitter?'"

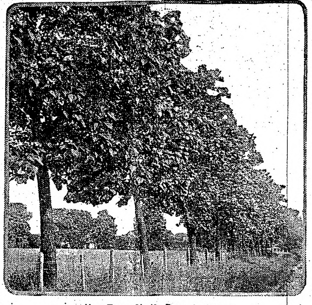
FOR BEAUTY AND USEFULNESS



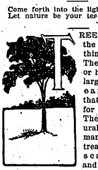
How Trees Glorify Every Landscape.

BENEFITS OF TREES

Natural Friends of Man Treated With Scant Courtesy.

They Furnish Building Materials, Furniture, Implements, Utensils, Tools and Other Things in the Greatest Variety.

> Come forth into the light of things:
> Let nature be your teacher.
> —Wordsworth.



TREES are among the most common things in nature. They either cover or have covered a large part of the earth's surface that is suitable for human life. They are the natural friends of man, yet we often treat them with scant courtesy, and sometimes regard them as of little use, if not actual enemies. A little study will reveal some of the things that trees do. Animals grow and become larger. This is due to the food they eat. Trees also grow, but they use different food, and take it in quite a different way. They live upon mineral matter—that is, air, water and soil, which they change into their own substance. By gradual addition of new material, trees become larger and larger each year, for growth is simply the increase of a living thing in size and substance.

Trees help to keep the air pure for man and the lower animals. How do they do this? The element of the air that makes it fit for breathing is a gas called oxygen. About one-fifth of the volume of the air is oxygen, and at every breath animals take in some of this oxygen and change it into carbonic acid gas. In other words, the oxygen is breathed in, combines with the carbon in the blood and this makes carbonic gas, which is breathed out into the air in place of the oxygen taken in. There is a small amount of carbonic acid gas in the air everywhere, and at all times; the usual amount is about one part in every 2,500 parts of air.

This carbonic acid is unfit for the breathing of animals, and wherever it increases in the air, even to a slight extent above the usual amount found, animals cannot live. Trees and other plants prevent the carbonic acid from accumulating in dangerous quantities in ordinary air. They do this by absorbing this gas through their leaves. It is their principal food. It makes trees grow, for a little more than one-half of the trunks and branches of every tree is carbon, and this all comes from the carbonic acid from the air.

Trees supply a large part of all the fuel in the world. The real wood of trees is of little or no use as a food, but it does largely serve to cook food and serve as a protection against cold. Even the coal dug from the earth, as well as the coal and gas now so generally used for fuel, come from the vegetable matter and are largely the remains of trees in forests that flourished before man existed on earth.

Trees give us wood, and wood furnishes building material, furniture, implements, utensils, tools and other useful things in great variety. Wood is one of the necessities of life. We are rocked in cradles made of wood; when we sit down, it is in chairs or benches of wood; every day we eat from wooden tables; the papers and books that we read and study are printed on paper made from wood; whenever we ride out it is in a wagon, carriage or car made largely of wood. More than one-half of the houses in the world are built of wood and the other half use wood for doors, floors and other interior parts; nearly all barns are made of wood. We ship our fruits, vegetables and many other products in baskets, barrels and crates made of wood; we pack our butter and pork, and buy our nails and salt in firkins, kegs or barrels made of wood. Wood is indispensable to our comfort, convenience and happiness.

Trees furnish one of the most striking and permanent forms of beauty. What stately grace, what fine proportions, what variety of expression, and what unconscious dignity may be seen in a well-developed tree. How they beautify and glorify every landscape. Trees improve the climate and conserve soil and water. Although the influence of trees and forests on climate is not definitely known, the effect of an all too reckless destruction is beginning to be felt. Springs and streams are failing that never failed before; soil droughts are more severe and protracted. Untimely frosts are more ruinous to all the more delicate fruits, and wind storms are more damaging than in former years.

Trees furnish safe shelter and natural resting places for birds. Birds are the best allies we have in fighting insects, but the removal of the forests has greatly lessened the number of insect-eating birds. Trees furnish a great variety of miscellaneous, useful products, such as fruits, nuts, sugar, honey, tannin, pitch, turpentine, dyes and medicines.

As the only source of wood supply, trees touch the welfare of every man, woman and child, but their influence goes much farther. It underlies the great questions of soil preservation and soil fertility; the use and control of rivers and streams; the water supply of towns and cities. In short, civilization and progress are based largely on trees. There is no crime against nature that draws down a more certain or severe punishment than that of stripping the earth of all her trees.—William R. Lazenby, Professor of Forestry, Ohio State University.

WHAT DO WE PLANT?

What do we plant when we plant the tree?
We plant the ship which will cross the sea,
We plant the masts to carry the sails,
We plant the plank to withstand the gales,
The keel, keelson and beam and knee,
We plant the ship when we plant the tree.
What do we plant when we plant the tree?
We plant the houses for you and me,
We plant the rafters, the shingles, the floor,
We plant the studding, the laths, the door,
The beams and sidings, all parts that be,
We plant the house when we plant the tree.
What do we plant when we plant the tree?
A thousand things that we daily see.
We plant the spire that out-towers the crag,
We plant the staff for our country's flag,
We plant the shade, from the hot sun free,
We plant all these when we plant the tree.
—Henry Abbey.

TREES HAVE HUMAN TRAITS

They Possess Some of the Same Characteristics That Belong to People.

Trees have the power of suggesting thoughts and feelings. These thoughts and feelings are attributes of people. In other words, trees are sometimes thought of as being possessed of some of the same characteristics that belong to people. The oak tree, because of its size and shape of limbs, suggests strength. The elm tree symbolizes grace and beauty. The birch is sometimes called the "Lady of the Forest." Some trees are weeping, some gay, some quiet and retiring. Some, such as the sycamore, are ghostlike. Others, like the honey locust, because of the great array of thorns, appear warlike. The Lombardy poplar, which grows so tall, suggests precision. One of these trees standing by itself like a lone sentinel is one of Nature's most impressive sights.

Exposition Chief Buys Haynes Car

Chas. C. Moore, President of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, has purchased a Haynes four-cylinder car equipped with the Vulcan Electric Gear Shift.

Worthy of note is the fact that this car is the twenty-seventh owned by Mr. Moore. It is in constant use—much more so than were any of its twenty-six predecessors, and, due largely to its simplicity of control, Mr. Moore frankly admits that only now is he deriving the real pleasures of motoring. No doubt about it—the hand shift method suffers by comparison.

Before you buy, look over other cars at the price you want to pay, compare the specifications, part for part with those of the Haynes. Here are a few facts regarding the

HAYNES

America's First Car

The Haynes motor has a bore of 4¼ in. and a stroke of 5½ in.; cylinders cast in pairs; L-head design; valves enclosed; with a dynamometer rating of 65 and 48 horsepower on the "six" and "four," respectively. Ignition is provided by the American Simms Dual High Tension Magneto; carburetion, by the Stromberg device; electric lighting and starting, by the Leece-Neville separate unit system; and cooling by centrifugal pump, pressed steel fan and cellular radiator.

Other Haynes specifications are the splash and gravity lubrication system; contracting band clutch; Timken and McCue full floating rear axles; twenty-one gallon gas tank on rear of chassis; motor-driven tire pump; extra demountable rim; and Collins curtains. Shock absorbers on the "six."

The Haynes "Four"	$1785 and $1985
The Haynes "Six" 130 inch wheelbase	2500 and 2700
The Haynes "Six" 136 inch wheelbase	2585 and 2785

FRICTION REDUCING MOTOR OIL

Insures Perfection in Lubrication

Improper lubrication is often the cause of motor troubles for which the motor car, motor boat or motor truck itself is blamed.

Use POLARINE—perfect lubrication. It develops every motor's maximum efficiency, maintaining the correct lubricating body at any motor speed or temperature—flowing freely at zero, and obviating the necessity of changing oil for cold and hot weather driving.

Back to Broadway

By George Randolph Chester

(Copyright by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

The mere fact that he was a many times millionaire and owned or controlled enough railroads to string almost twice across the continent did not help the far-famed E. H. Cash one bit in the present juncture. Indeed, his illustrious name was much more likely, if he ventured to use it, to get him into trouble than to aid him.

Impossible as it may seem, the illustrious ringmaster of the financial circus was without a cent, in a strange city, a distressingly immense distance from New York, and with absolutely no prospect of getting money unless he should earn it by manual labor, like any other homeless and penniless wanderer. Such an absurd condition was his own fault entirely, and due to two causes: his tremendous business energy and his equally notable personal carelessness.

Mr. Cash was supposed to have started upon a summer cruise in northern waters, and had ostensibly cut the cables from all his business affairs. At Quebec, however, some newspapers had been brought aboard, and in one of them he found an obscure four-line item which made him change his plans in a hurry.

"I am afraid I'll have to apply for a week's shore leave," he explained to his guests, a "stag" crowd. "You fellows don't need any help in entertaining yourselves, for you never get away from the poker table anyhow except to eat and sleep. You own the Petrel till I get back. Just lazy around wherever you like, and pick me up here a week from Monday morning, if you will."

As he hastily threw some necessities into a traveling bag, he noted that he needed a shave, but there was no time for it now. He had almost literally "jumped" into a plain traveling suit, and did not even stop to put on his watch. He found that he had enough cash on hand to pay for his transportation, berth and meals en route, and beyond that he had no worry, for his checkbook and papers were in his traveling bag.

Ashore, he caught his train with but brief minutes to spare, and was so absorbed in the deal he meant to put through that he was a hundred miles on his way before he missed his luggage, finding in place of it only the uncomfortable reflection that throughout his long 30-hour ride he would be deprived of a shave and clean linen.

He was not one given to worry, however, and when he had his final brushing up at his destination he mechanically handed a dollar to the porter; but after he had left the train he found to his dismay that he had only one solitary ten-cent piece in his pocket.

Five cents of that he used in carfare to the office of the man he had so hastily come all this distance to see, and the other five cents he used in riding back downtown. His man had been called from the city that morning, and would not be back for a week or more! Preoccupied with vexation, he walked into the nearest big hotel and scrawled his signature upon the register.

The clerk hesitated a moment, though merely out of habitual courtesy.

"Your luggage not arrived yet, Mr. —er—Cash?" he stumbled, puzzling over the register

Mr. Cash smiled grimly and rubbed his unshaven chin.

"Lost en route," he replied.

"Very unfortunate," commented the clerk with rather a cold expression, his eyes resting casually upon the unshaven face and soiled linen. "The rules of the house, of course, require payment in advance."

The prospective guest frowned a bit haughtily.

"Cash is my name," he observed. "E. H. Cash—of New York."

"Quite so," agreed the clerk, still more coldly. "Some relation of the famous railroad operator, no doubt."

"I am that Cash," announced the other with a trace of anger, resenting the implied sneer.

"Wake up!" admonished the clerk, throwing off all his suavity. "You are asleep under the deck-awning of your yacht, the Petrel, Mr. Cash. You just steamed away from Quebec yesterday morning, bound for the Labrador coast, and are only dreaming that you are here." And before Mr. Cash's eyes he thrust a folded newspaper that had been lying at his elbow, pointing sternly to a paragraph.

"Yes, that was to have been true," said Cash, recognizing the reasonableness of the clerk's stand in the matter. "The yacht left there for a short cruise yesterday morning, with my friends aboard, but I took a run down here. I can tell you every man that was on the Petrel. There's Billy Edwards—"

"I know," the clerk interrupted him. "Here's the entire list of guests, which anybody could read. Now, drop it. In the first place, Cash has a mustache."

"The papers and their cartoonists are using the old photographs—they always do!" snapped Cash. "I have been without a mustache for over a year."

"Step out of the way!" snarled the clerk, pounding savagely upon a bell. "You're lucky I don't have you arrested."

Cash turned. The two or three men who had now come up behind him to register glared back at him in icy contempt, noting the unshaven face, the soiled collar and shirt front. For a moment he lost his poise, and a wild idea came to him of attempting to explain to these men. Even as the thought came, however, he realized the futility of it and walked out of the place, followed, too closely for comfort, by a broad shouldered porter. By the time he had gained the street he was fuming, but a blue-and-white sign a block away brought him back, with a comfortable jerk, to practical affairs. The sign betokened the location of a telegraph office, and as a happy haven of refuge he hurried to it.

"Collect," he directed presently, handing in his telegram at the receiving window.

The girl in charge did not even glance at the telegram. She was looking at the man; at the unshaven face and the soiled collar.

"Are you located in the city?" she asked mechanically.

"No."

"Where are you stopping?"

"Nowhere as yet," he confessed, angry with himself that he felt a flush rising under the skin of his cheeks.

"We can send no telegrams for you collect without a deposit sufficient to insure payment," she advised him.

"Look at that telegram," he expostulated; "see to whom it is addressed, and by whom it is signed!"

Still without looking at it she shoved the yellow slip toward him.

"It don't make any difference who it is to or who it is from," she insisted. "I've got my orders." And she turned to the next customer.

He glared at her for a moment, but she remained entirely unaware of his existence, and, crumbling the telegram in his hand, he strode out with a set of emotions too varied and too much commingled to classify. An attempt at a near-by bank to draw upon his New York house of exchange came more nearly resulting in his arrest than any of the other experiments, and it was a very much stupefied man who trudged aimlessly up the street, as much a pauper in this city, where he could not think of a soul who knew him, as any tramp with whom he might brush elbows!

He turned into a dreary little park, where a few discouraged-looking trees fought to suck life from the stern gravel in which they were rooted. It was a most unattractive place, and the only thing that drew him unconsciously into it was the fact that here were benches upon which he might rest without being expected to pay for anything. He was tired and hot, and, appalling fact! hungry; moreover, he noted with aversion that every lounger upon every bench bore the same attitude of hopeless dejection as himself. He had a bad quarter of an hour, in which a great many of his impressions of the corresponding relations of human beings to each other underwent a radical change. For one thing, he began to estimate his actual value, considered merely as two hands and a brain, if thrown upon the immediate market, for it looked as if the great railroad king would have to hunt a job at unskilled labor.

As he sat dejectedly humped over, his elbows upon his knees and his hands clasped idly together, he noticed that a brown skirt—with a draggled bit of braid at the bottom—that twice had slowly passed him, now stopped directly in front of him. Naturally he glanced up and found a very good-looking girl gazing fixedly down at him. The moment she met his eyes her face lighted with a smile of delight, and she came toward him.

"I just knew it was Mr. Cash," she began vivaciously. "My! this is a long way from Broadway, isn't it?"

No sound had ever rung more agreeably in his ears than his own name pronounced at this moment. For the last couple of hours that magic word had completely lost its power, and he began to realize how few people knew him after all. It was with a sense of positive gratitude that he answered this girl, whom he could not place, but whose face seemed pleasingly familiar.

"Indeed it is," he assented, rising and removing his hat. "I expect I am stupid, but really I cannot seem to place you, Miss—"

"Bessie Williams, but you don't know the name," she returned. "I used to manicure you in the Hotel Belveigh, don't you remember? You've had your mustache shaved off, but, goodness! I'd know those hands with the mole on both little fingers if I found you down in Africa stained with walnut juice. I guess you'll think I've got a nerve for wedging in this way, but honest, anybody that was ever nice to me in little old New York looks like a long-lost brother!"

He remembered her perfectly now, and he smiled with amusement as he recalled her vivid personality. She was a girl who had struggled up from the most squalid section of the East side, and was noted on Broadway, not only for her own uncompromising rigidity of conduct, but for the number of other girls she had saved from "making fools of themselves." More especially, however, she was known for the picturesque slang which had clung to her as the only mark of her origin, and for the originality with which she used it. In the present juncture he was surprised to find her suddenly hesitate and show a bit of embarrassment.

"I feel somewhat in the cold myself," he admitted, to put her at ease. "What brings you out here so far?"

"I'm my own lemon," she replied, recovering her vivacity at once and rattling on with the greatest sangfroid, once she had plunged into the main topic. "Say, Mr. Cash, I'm going to be real open-faced with you about my troubles, because I know you don't make any mistakes in the dark and you don't keep the small change glued down. Every time I ever saw you there was a circle of tips rolling away from you in every direction, and once when a bell-hop got his leg broke I saw you peel off a fifty before anybody could ask if he had a mother. It's this way with me. I'm so stony broke that a ten-cent piece would look the size of the full moon coming up out of the water at Rockaway beach, and if you will just ship me back among the tall buildings I'll manicure the whole Cash family for a year!"

"I wish I could," he said sincerely, "but I haven't a penny upon which I can lay my hands. I'm as hard up as any loafer in this park."

"I beg your pardon," said Miss Williams with more dignity than he had expected to find in her. "I am very sorry that I made such a mistake." And she turned to go.

He could see that she was both hurt and mortified; that she had instantly come to the conclusion that he did not care to help her.

"Wait a minute," he called after her, his sympathies wonderfully quickened by his own disagreeable experience. "Come back here and sit down. I was perfectly honest when I said that I am in as much trouble as you are."

She was still incredulous, but he was so earnest in his insistence that she reluctantly came back and allowed him to seat her upon the bench beside him. He explained to her in careful detail precisely what had happened to him, and his unshaven face and soiled collar were sufficient corroboration. She laughed at his somberness when he had finished.

"Lovely!" she exclaimed with sparkling eyes. "For a minute I was afraid exchange had given me the wrong number, but I couldn't figure out how you'd joined the T. Wad family so quick. But now watch the blue trail of our gasoline. Come with your Aunt Bessie!"

She sprang to her feet and he arose uncertainly.

"Where are you going?" he asked.

"To beat it before the banks close," she exultantly replied. "Before three o'clock we'll be looking over an assorted collection of time-tables, and I won't owe you a cent for my fare to New York and a new outfit from plume to patent leathers. Now, don't ask me how I'm going to do it, or I'll giggle myself to death over how easy it is."

"If blind can lead blind I am very willing to be led," he laughingly observed as he caught step with her. "But you have not told me about your own troubles."

"Me!" she said with infinite disdain. "I fell a victim to my own fatal beauty, and it gave me the brain storm all right. I dreamed I had a voice and a figure, and that if I just let the public know about them I'd have Patti forgotten and Melba retired on a pension. So I tried it, and 'The Belle of Broadway Company' Number Forty-Two quit here. That's all. There's only seven people in this town with pink nails and there's 42 girls to look after them. If I'd send to mother for a cent she'd have to borrow a jimmy and a dark lantern to get it; if I'd send to the boss barber at the Belveigh I'd get money so quick the edges would be scorched off when it got here, but I'd have to marry Jimmy when I got back, and while starving would be quicker, it wouldn't be so painful. And that starvation turn's no musical comedy, either. I've got a dinky little two-by-two room paid for until tomorrow night, and then it would have been little me to somebody's kitchen with a half-Nelson on a gas range. And I can't boil eggs."

They had crossed the little park by this time, and had stopped in front of one of those dingy-looking houses that have the perpetual smell of mildew in the front hall. She ushered him into a dim parlor embellished with six pieces of ragged plush furniture and a collection of atrocious wax flowers on the mantel under a glass globe, and then she tripped upstairs to the third floor. In a moment she hurried back with her suit case and a bowl of water. She threw up a blind and placed the bowl on a little table beside the window.

"First of all, you've got to look the part, so dip in your hand," she directed him as she opened the suitcase and produced her manicure set. She was silent only until she sat down. "When I get back to little old Broadway tomorrow night," she rattled on as she deftly and vigorously manicured him, "I'll promise never to get farther than four blocks away from the subway again as long as I live. I used to kick because I'd get called up to a room, as sure as death that the job would take an hour and a half, and that there'd be no tip; to manicure some waspy woman with hair on the table and her complexion on the dresser, and her figure hanging up in a closet, and the rest of her beauty scattered on four chairs and the bed; but even that would be joy to me now. I've seen all of the country I want, and it's Bessie-sit-by-the-fire for me from this on! I'm willing to live the rest of my life with the 'L' trains rattling over my head; and when I die, if they'll just bury me any place on the Great White Way, I'll lie happy and still in my grave forever. Now you're done." A sour-visaged old lady had come to the door and glared at them, then walked away. "I don't owe her a cent, and she don't bite," observed the girl; "so just you sit here and look sassy till I get back."

She dried her manicure set and packed it in its roll of chamois and flannel and fine leather, put on her hat, and left him alone. In ten minutes she had returned, bearing a heavy package and jingling some coins in her hand.

"I got two dollars, one for the tools and one for my good looks," she joyously announced, "which is bright and cheerful when you remember that the tools only cost me 20 and the handsome face was a present. I gave a polite colored gentleman ten cents for these bricks, right out of his hod, so we've got a dollar-ninety to represent our capital."

"Bricks!" he repeated with a wondering glance at the bundle. "What on earth do you want with those?"

"To put in the suit case, so it won't go straight up when a bell-hop grabs it," she replied. "There's nothing in there now but an old waist that I couldn't get a cent on. Just think! I was going to hock that nice, ready-money-looking suit case the minute I got back to the room, if I hadn't met you! Now, you take this dollar-ninety. Right around the corner there's a ten-cent barber shop, and a gent's furnishing goods store right next door. You buy you one collar for 15 cents, one pair of cuffs for a quarter, one shave for ten cents, one shine for five cents, and a real extravagant-looking 15-cent cigar, but don't light the cigar. Have you got a clean handkerchief?" Fortunately he had. "Give it to me. Now, you bring back the dollar-thirty to spread around in tips; and hurry!"

When he returned, shaved and much refreshed, she had run a white thread through the hem of his handkerchief, and this she slipped up under his collar, tying it behind. So far as it was visible it looked like an immaculate white negligee shirt. She had him cut off his attached cuffs and don the clean ones.

"You look the part," she announced as she surveyed him with pride. "In a few jiffs I'll have a double extra sirloin for mine, please, but don't let me think about it or I'll faint."

Fifteen minutes later, his 15-cent cigar in fragrant evidence, he stood at the register of the best hotel in town—not the one to which he had gone before—but he did not sign himself "E. H. Cash." Instead he wrote:

O. H. Jones.
Miss Gertrude Jones.

"The two best suites you have," he ordered.

"Yes, sir. Mr. Jones," said the clerk deferentially, glancing at the respectable, brick-laden suit-case. "Anything you want sent up?"

"A boy with some telegraph blanks and a waiter."

Presently there came down from him a telegram marked "prepaid," and to be charged upon his bill. It was addressed to Henry Cruse of Henry Cruse & Co., bankers, New York, and read like this:

"Here incog. Jiggers, larruped, woolly. Wire $1,030 immediately to me as O. H. Jones, care Hotel Grace. Describe me, but waive other identification."

The telegram was unsigned, but the private code words in the body of the telegram were better than a signature. Having sent the wire, Mr. Cash knocked at the door of Miss Williams' reception room.

"Come in," cried a cheerful voice, and he opened the door.

She was at the telephone, and her eyes were sparkling as she nodded to him, but she went right on talking into the transmitter.

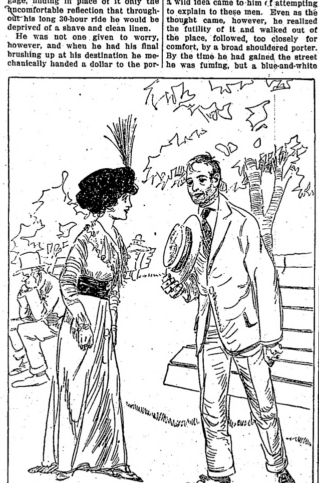
"Yes, size 36; and I shall want a brunette traveling gown and a hat to match. Send over at least half a dozen for selection."

"Get a whole outfit!" he interjected as she repeated her address and hung up the receiver. "Get all the dresses you want. We take the same train out of here at seven o'clock this evening, and you shall have all afternoon to shop. Do you care to have lunch downstairs, or up here, until you get better gowned?"

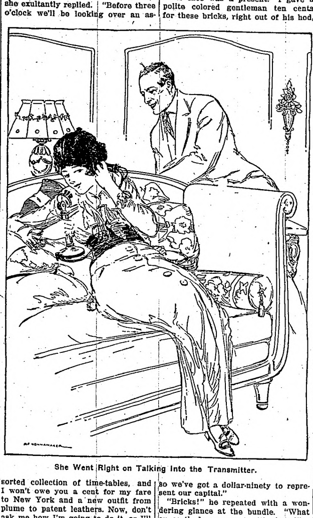
"Right here and right now," she replied. "You'd better have it sent up a little at a time, for fear I choke at first—but keep it coming for at least two hours. I haven't had enough to eat since I crossed to New Jersey."

"I'll see that you don't starve," he laughed. "I owe you meals for a long time, and a lot besides. I'm going to set you up in business, for one thing. Just pick out what you think you want and I'll see that you get it."

"I don't want a thing," she said fervently, "but just little old Broadway!"



"But, Really, I Can't Seem to Please You, Miss."



She Went Right on Talking Into the Transmitter.

NEW IDEA OF EARTH'S AGE

Radium Has Caused Change in Scientist's Opinions During the Past Five Years.

If such an authority as Prof. Arthur Holmes of the Imperial college, South Kensington, London, has any weight at all with people, the discovery of radium means that geologists must change their calculations materially as to the age of the earth if they wish to be taken seriously. He says, according to the New Press, it is a well known fact that if the proportion of radium in the interior of the earth is in any way equal to the radium in the rocks of the earth's surface the earth will not grow colder, as has always been taught, but it ought to be growing hotter. Calculations, however, show that the distribution of radium as it is found would be more than enough to keep the temperature of the earth stationary. Thorium and uranium also supply a great amount of heat and must be taken into account.

In order that the earth should be neither growing hotter nor cooling at a rate allowed by the radio-active elements as they disintegrate it is necessary, he says, to assume that the earth's store of radium be concentrated near the surface. The radio-active elements are found most abundantly in acid rocks, and their more basic associates are less rich. These acid rocks are characteristic of only the outermost zones of the crust, and there are many reasons for believing that with depth the nonacid rocks are predominant.

Earthquakes and similar terrestrial events have provided facts from which the condition of the earth's interior may be deduced with confidence. First, there is the crust zone, which has an approximate thickness of 30 miles. Then comes the stone zone, something under 100 miles thick, and, finally, the central iron core of the earth, with a density eight times greater than water. Meteorites contain radium, and Professors Strutt and Holmes say that these meteors contain the proof that no radium is found in the stone zone or inner core.

It is supposed that the earth began, of course, as a misty, nebulous mass and that it has become the great mass it is by the capture of meteors and greater masses floating in space during the ages. It is very unlikely that the earth was ever, as a whole, in a molten condition. It is surmised by several English savants that the internal heat probably arose in a great measure from the condensation of the mass as it grew.

The temperature would slowly rise until the fusion point of certain of the earth's constituents was reached. Then the pockets and tongues thus formed would tend to move away from the center, and the less heavy, stony substances would be squeezed outward relatively to a network of the heavier, rigid metals.

Surrounding the metallic core a thick zone of sandy rocks would be formed and the radio-active materials would be concentrated in the stony layers. When the oceans and the atmospheres were produced the sediment rocks appeared for the first time, and then came the earth's crust with the rocks that contain most of the radium and other radio-active elements. Before the advent of radium geologists did not recognize the difficulties presented by the peculiar makeup of the earth's crust. Radium did not create this difficulty, but it certainly emphasized it in the attention of scientists.

It can hardly be said that radium has given a blank check on the bank of time, for its discovery not only destroyed all the old measurements of the earth's heat, but it necessitated a new method for getting at it. Every kind of radio-active mineral, as well as radium, may be regarded as a self-contained hour glass; the radio-active emanations, such as helium, and residues such as lead, slowly accumulate at the expense of their ultimate parent uranium.

The geologist, who five years ago was embarrassed by the brevity of the time allowed to him for the evolution of the earth's crust, is now still more embarrassed by the overabundance of time that now confronts him. The recognition of radium means difficulties for the geologist and the absolute overthrow of every acknowledged theory as to the earth's age and development. The age of the earth, according to what happens to be radium, varies from 5,000,000,000 to 3,000,000,000 years, but what matters a few thousand million of years among geologists?

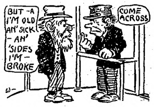
Conductor Tells of Troubles With Passengers

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.—"Yes," said the street car conductor, growing communicative after an altercation with a passenger about a transfer of ancient vintage, "this here job's a cinch—you oughta try it. In this business you learn things about folks, you do. For instance, t'other day a sorry-lookin' old party wanted to ride free with me because he hadn't the price of a fare and he was too old and sick to walk, but I'd seen him before and I said 'nixie.' I thought the men on the back platform would put me off, the way they went at me and the company and everybody connected for a soulless bunch, and at last one man tried to make me ashamed by coughing up a nickel. The old man was grateful to him and went in and picked out the choice seat in front where he could put his two feet on the other seat.



BUT -A I'M OLD AN' SICK - AN' 'SIDES I'M - BROKE COME ACROSS

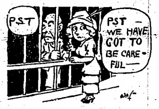
"Says I to the nickel giver, 'You think I'm a cigar sign for heart, but if you want to get wise just drop off when the vener'ble gent does and be a sleuth. If everything's all right report the next time you ride with me and I'll give you this nickel back.'

"Well, that got him curious like, and he did it, and some time later I happened to pick him up again, and the first thing he pushed me out a cigar. 'Say, pardner, you were right about that old guy,' he said. 'What did he do but beat it for the nearest booze joint and load up with a good stiff 'un, and then carry off a pint of red juice, and he didn't ask the barkeep to give it to him neither.'

"A girl one day handed me a transfer. It was punched for the wrong day, the wrong hour and the wrong line, but she crossed her heart and said she'd just got it, so I let it go, 'cause, of course, you can't set a little kid girl out on the curb. At the end of the line I noticed she was having trouble with her mind and she says, 'Say, mister, I wasn't telling you no story about that transfer. I did just get it. I just got it off the pavement.'"

Picturesque Institutions of Gotham Eliminated

NEW YORK.—A picturesque bit of New York life is being eliminated pretty rapidly by that industrious young woman, Mrs. "Katie" Davis, our new commissioner of corrections. She threw up her hands in horror at the hoary old custom she found in our famous bastile, proceeded to get a new broom and made a clean sweep. She has even dared to squelch the insidious evil of the woman charity worker, which is still in great vogue at Sing Sing.



PST
PST - WE HAVE GOT TO BE CARE-FUL—

Why, it's come to such a pass that it's almost impossible to pass a "shot o' hop" to a friend temporarily detained.

A young woman called to see her husband, accused of petit larceny. She submitted to a search of her person. This has been the rule always, of course, but the Davis search wasn't like the traditional style. Miss Davis' underling went so far that the young woman became very nervous. The searcher became more curious, and especially interested in a pretty little hat pin. It had a long, black, shiny head. And the pin was rudely drawn from the hat. It was hollow, in fact, had once served as the cap of a fountain pen. White cotton was packed inside and the core was a quantity of white powder. "About four grains of morphine," said Dr. Lichtenstein, the Tombs physician. So the young woman was soon occupying a cell near her husband.

Shooting Follows the Loss of One Cigarette

MILWAUKEE, WIS.—A quarrel over a cigarette resulted in two men being shot and a sixteen-year-old boy charged with the shooting early the other morning. Gust Ewert, eighteen years old, 592 Madison street, was shot in the left breast, the bullet striking directly over the heart.

Albert Schmidt, twenty years old, 560 Sixteenth avenue, received a bullet behind the right ear. Vincent Walsh, sixteen years old, who, according to the police, did the shooting, was held over on a warrant charging him with assault.

After the shooting, which occurred at Ninth and National avenues shortly after three o'clock, Ewert was taken to the residence of Dr. Harry S. Piggins. An examination disclosed that the bullet, which was steel tipped, had lodged half an inch beneath the surface of the skin in the chest wall.

Schmidt's examination at Emergency hospital by Dr. Scheele showed that the bullet had struck the mastoid bone of the skull just behind the left ear. It plowed through the hard shell and into the soft cellular recesses of the bone and thence ran into the ear, from where it was easily extracted.

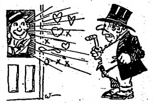
The story told by the three concerned was identical in that the shooting resulted from the theft of a cigarette from Walsh's mouth.

Ewert, Schmidt and several other young men passed Walsh on the street. One of the two victims snatched Walsh's cigarette from his mouth.

The lad drew a revolver from his pocket and fired three times, it is said.

No More "Spooning" Via This Bank's Telephone

ST. LOUIS, MO.—Cupid was blocking the right of way of Mammon, so the doors of the public telephone booths in the National Bank of Commerce were removed. When the bank building was erected special booths were constructed on both sides of the Olive street entrance. They had large glass doors and were sound proof. They were meant for the use of persons who had confidential communications for their financial agents.



Courting couples took possession of the marble-lined, glass-doored, soundproof booths. Famous financiers, with large interests in stock and bonds, would seek instant communication with their brokers.

They might be on the "bull" side of a falling market. Every moment meant the loss or gain of thousands of dollars.

Vainly the men of Mammon walked nervously up and down the tessalated corridor of the bank, or pounded at the glass doors. Love laughed at bankers even more uproariously than it laughs at locksmiths.

W. B. Cowen, vice-president of the bank, said that no doubt it was true that "love makes the world go round."

"But love clogs the wheels of business," said Mr. Cowen, "so we had to take the doors off the booths."

"Now the boys and girls do not take up much time exchanging soft nothings and a poor banker can get a chance to make himself some money by putting through a deal by phone once in a while."

MRS. WARREN NOT A CLUBWOMAN

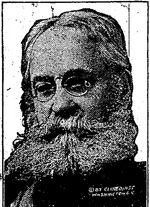
Mrs. Francis E. Warren, the young wife of Senator Warren of Wyoming, was known in Washington society during her girlhood. Before she came to take her place as a matron of the official set at the capital she was often a guest at the home of her uncle, the late Justice Brown of the Supreme court.

Senator and Mrs. Warren are now occupying what was formerly the Brown home, in which, as a girl Mrs. Warren spent so many happy days. It is well adapted to entertaining on a generous scale. Its drawing rooms contain some rare pieces of old mahogany which would delight the eye of the collector, but Mrs. Warren prizes them most for their family associations. The guestroom of this mansion is furnished with colonial pieces which are probably as beautiful examples of the craftsmanship of that period as are in existence.

Mrs. Warren is fond of society and finds the cosmopolitan social life in Washington particularly interesting, but she is essentially a home woman. She takes great delight in reading, and some of her happiest hours are spent in her big, well-stocked library.

Mrs. Warren is not a clubwoman. She is, however, "a suffragist by marriage," as she says when asked for her views on equal suffrage. Then she explains that Wyoming, her husband's state, enfranchised its women nearly half a century ago.

EXPLORER GREELY STILL VIGOROUS



©BY CLINEDINST WASHINGTON D.C.

As vigorous and active as many men of half his age, Maj. Gen. Adolphus Greely, famous as a soldier and Arctic explorer, reached the seventieth milestone of his life's journey a few days ago. Since his retirement from active service six years ago General Greely has made his residence in Washington city. Much of his time, however, has been spent abroad, where he has interested himself in the study of aviation, military affairs and geography and kindred sciences.

General Greely is a native of Newburyport, Mass., where he was born March 27, 1844. He served in the Union army from 1861 to 1865 and was the first man who entered the Civil war as a private soldier to attain the rank of brigadier general in the regular service.

More than 30 years ago General Greely attracted world-wide attention by a polar expedition of which he was the chief. This expedition sailed northward in 1881. It contained 25 members, of whom only seven came back. Two relief expeditions failed to find the Greely party, and when finally rescued by the third expedition, sent under command of Capt. Winfield Scott Schley, the survivors of the party were nearly crazed with hunger.

VISCOUNTESS D'AZY IS POPULAR

Viscountess Benoist d'Azy, the young wife of the naval attache of the French embassy at Washington, is known as the most popular woman in the diplomatic corps. Accomplished and highly original, she has also a gift for leadership that is generally recognized. She is usually prime mover in private theatricals, winter sports, costume dances and other diversions with which society amuses itself, and she often bends her energies upon the successful consummation of some enterprise which she has organized for one American charity or another. Not long ago she produced the play, "Le Voyageur," in the ballroom of the mansion of Mr. and Mrs. Franklin MacVeagh. Viscountess d'Azy herself played a role, and the other members of an unusually distinguished cast were the Countess Bertier de Sauvigny, wife of the military attache of the French embassy; Baron von Nagell, Baron Karl von Freudenthal and Mr. von Rath. The play was given as a benefit for the Washington diet kitchen and $1,000 was realized.

The Viscountess d'Azy has five children. The daughter of the Marquis de Vogue, himself a scion of one of the oldest houses in France and a member of the French Academy, she was married, as are most French girls of gentle blood, almost as soon as she entered her teens. She is a devoted mother, and the comrade and playmate of her five children, whose names are Charles, Elaine, Clare, Margaret and Martha.

SAYS DIVISION OF PRODUCTS IS PROBLEM

"The equitable division of that which is produced is a problem we have not yet solved," declared Sectary Wilson of the department of labor in an address at the first anniversary banquet of the department in Washington the other night.

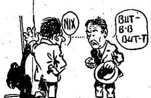
"Nobody has yet presented a concrete plan by which this problem can be solved. Some say collective ownership of all means of production, distribution and exchange would solve it and give to every man the full social equivalent of that which his labor produces. But assuming you have collective ownership of all means, how are you going to determine what the full social equivalent is?

"In the primitive state of society such a thing might have been possible, but not now. No; collective ownership would not give us a solution. Maybe a solution will come yet, though not as the result of one man's brilliant idea, but from some thought upon thought, idea upon idea, until every man on earth may have a full social equivalent of his labor."

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Acting War Chief Is Barred From the House

WASHINGTON.—Henry Breckenridge, assistant secretary of war, found out the other day that the rules of the house does not admit to the floor assistant secretaries, even though they are for the time acting cabinet officers.



Mr. Breckenridge is very much interested in the tolls debate and the other afternoon started to walk past William Ghormley, assistant doorkeeper, who guards the portals at the southeast entrance. Mr. Ghormley put up his hands as a sign to Mr. Breckenridge not to enter.

"I am entitled to enter," said Mr. Breckenridge stiffly.

"How's that?" asked Mr. Ghormley courteously.

"I am the assistant secretary of war," said Breckenridge. "In fact, today I am the acting secretary of war."

"That does not entitle you to the floor privilege," responded Mr. Ghormley.

"I have been told that I can go in," persisted Mr. Breckenridge.

"It is against the rules of the house," responded Mr. Ghormley. "If you want some one of more authority I will send for the chief doorkeeper."

Mr. Ghormley sent a page to hunt up Joseph F. Sinnott, chief doorkeeper. The boy could not find him. At this point Representative Oscar Underwood passed by.

"If you are waiting for someone you may go to my office," said Mr. Underwood.

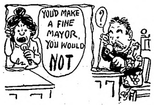
"I wish you would find out whether I can go in," insisted Mr. Breckenridge. "I do not intend to be subjected any further to such indignities, young man; give me your name."

Mr. Breckenridge took the name and went away.

The rules of the house admit only cabinet members.

Wrong Man, but Got Call-Down Just the Same

REPRESENTATIVE W. J. CARY of Milwaukee, Wis., is considered a very busy man. It is only occasionally that he can steal away and forget that he is in the capital of his country, representing one of her great states. On one such evening, recently, he attended a stag party, and did not get back to his hotel until some time after midnight. It was Saturday night, or, rather, Sunday morning, and he slipped into bed with a sigh of relief at the thought that he could sleep all day if he liked.



YOU'D MAKE A FINE MAYOR, YOU WOULD NOT

About seven o'clock the telephone bell rang, startling him out of the nicest rest he had had for weeks. So it was not with a very pleasant voice that he said:

"Hello——'

"Hello——" answered central. There's Boston——"

"Boston?" was the astounded reply. "Somebody from Boston calling me? You must be mistaken——"

"Hello! Hello!" came impatiently from Boston, and, without waiting for response, launched into a tirade of abuse.

"You're the man that got up on the house floor the other day and declared that the Boston tea party was one of those historical fakes; that our ancestors were all drunk at the time—eh?"

"No, madam. I assure you that you are mistaken. I'm not the man. You have the wrong man. I say——" But shrill ejaculations that he was the man and he needn't deny it interrupted.

"But, madam, you are only spending a lot of money to tell me of something I——'

"I don't care how much money I spend, I wanted to have the pleasure of denouncing you—you, who are trying to be mayor of Boston. Yes, you're a fine man to be our mayor, now, aren't you?"

Educational Work Makes a Hit With the Sailors

NOT only are the enlisted men of the navy displaying an amazing interest in the educational work recently instituted by Secretary Daniels on board warships, but the officers also are applying themselves with great diligence to the task of teaching the men. This, in substance, is the report of George A. Reeder, shipboard secretary of the Young Men's Christian association, assigned to the Atlantic battleship fleet, made public by the navy department.

4X8=32 DUGGUNNIT —??!- THAT DON'T SEEM JUST RIGHT EITHER

Secretary Reeder relates that on the second day at sea the men of the fleet were summoned below decks to listen to the reading of the department circular, outlining the plan of education and the various lines of study that the men could study. It was both interesting and amusing, he says, to see the expressions on the old sea dogs as they heard the courses outlined and discussed the studies they were going to pursue. The real spirit of the work, however, he said, began to manifest itself when "school call" sounded on the following day and the men went to their class rooms.

"The enterest that was developed on the part of the men was amazing," Mr. Reeder said.

Rep. Kahn Says Japanese Girls Like Fat Men

THE writer of the popular song, "Nobody Loves a Fat Man," ought to go to Japan and learn his error. So says Representative Julius Kahn of California, who is very far from being a "lightweight" champion when it comes to adipose tissue. Mr. Kahn is a great traveler and has found his size of some disadvantage in foreign countries when it comes to the matter of transportation, for in China the men who carry passengers in chairs always get twice the number of carriers when he goes out on a trip. It was the same way in other Oriental lands; everywhere he had to pay double.

In Japan, however, he met his reward. In the land of the chrysanthemum fat is regarded as a sign of beauty, and is an object greatly to be wished for by the men. One evening Mr. Kahn and his wife were at a bazar. Strolling about they finally paused before the booth of a fair maiden.

The girl gazed with admiration on the imposing figure of the American representative and at last ran out from behind the table, threw her arms around his neck and burst out into exclamations of delight.

"Oh, how nice!" she cried in broken English. "Nice and fat!" proceeding to bestow a series of most emphatic hugs on the object of her admiration.

Mrs. Kahn burst into laughter and the representative hastened to extricate himself and hie away from the building.

State News of General Interest

TO PLAN DETAILS OF RESERVE BANK

FINANCIERS OF THIS REGIONAL DISTRICT TO MEET IN ST. PAUL.

WILL OPEN ABOUT JUNE 1

Minneapolis Federal Institution to Be Established by That Date, Is the Prediction of Bankers.

St. Paul.—Bankers from every state comprising the ninth regional reserve district will meet in St. Paul Friday to select directors and to agree upon other details of the new Federal bank. The district is composed of Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana and parts of Wisconsin and Michigan.

All Bankers Invited.

This meeting was decided upon at the meeting here of national bankers from St. Paul, Minneapolis and Duluth. All banking associations in the district have been invited to send representatives to the conference.

A long telegram was sent to Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo asking for an explanation of the grouping of banks into three classes according to their capital. The Minnesota bankers are not clear on this and want the information for the meeting.

To Await Federal Action.

After several hours' discussion it was decided that, according to the new law, the Federal reserve board at Washington must appoint the chairman and its three directors before the banks involved can elect the six directors to which they are entitled. The chairman selected will have much to do in the conducting of the election.

No definite steps have been taken to make tentative selections of directors. It was dcided to allow this to go over until the meeting when all the banks will be represented.

Several surprises were found in the new currency law during the conference. It was discovered that the position of government agent is comparatively unimportant, the agent's chief duty being to take care of the collateral for the government, his salary to be fixed by the Federal reserve board.

To Open About June 1.

It is the opinion of the bankers that the new institution will not be started until shortly before June 1.

There was some question about where the big meeting April 24 should be held, but the St. Paul bankers won the argument.

The various banks have thirty days in which to subscribe for stock in the new regional reserve bank. Under the law they must subscribe for an amount equal to 6 per cent of their capital stock and surplus. It is not believed that any of the banks will subscribe until after the conference.

ABLE MINNESOTA EDITOR DIES

H. G. Day, of Albert Lea, Was One of Oldest Newspaper Men in State.

Albert Lea. — Harwood G. Day, aged sixty-nine, owner of the Freeborn County Standard, brother of former Lieutenant Governor Frank A. Day of Fairmont, and one of the oldest editors in the state, died here of ptomaine poisoning, resulting from eating canned soup.

Mr. Day had conducted his paper at Albert Lea for 30 years and was known as a free lance in county and state politics. John Lind, personal representative of President Wilson in Mexico, once said of him that he was the ablest editorial writer in the state of Minnesota. Mr. Day had been president of the State Editorial association, besides holding scores of offices in Albert Lea and Freeborn county. He had been active in municipal affairs of Albert Lea for 30 years and in development work in this part of Minnesota.

State Elk in New Home.

Akeley.—State Forester W. T. Cox and his assistants transferred the carload of elk from the Red Lake Northern railroad to Douglas lodge and elk park, which has an area of 167 acres fenced. The elk were transferred in crated wagons. As soon as they were released from the wagons they hurried to the tall timber. It is said the elk, of which there are fourteen, will cost the state less than one hundred dollars apiece delivered at Itasca park.

Clever Swindler Busy Again.

Faribault.—Cognizant of the slackening demand for coal, due to warmer weather, and of the consequent increase of the pleasure of the coal man over new orders, a forger visited the office of the Farmers' Fuel company, used the telephone ostensibly to call up his home to inquire what kind and how much coal was needed; then gave the manager a check for $17. The check was cashed, $2 retained for the coal ordered, and the balance returned to the buyer.

GEORGE F. AUTHIER

George F. Authier, Minneapolis newspaper man, who is secretary to Governor A. O. Eberhart, has taken personal charge of the governor's campaign for the Republican renomination in Minnesota.

SELECT BRAINERD FOR '15

Present Officers of State Sunday School Society Are Re-elected.

Winona.—The annual business session of the State Sunday School association was held Friday. Brainerd invited the society to meet there next year and the invitation was accepted.

The nominating committee recommended the re-election of all old officers, who are: President, J. H. Martin, Minneapolis; vice president, Dr. R. W. Bowden, Duluth; recording secretary, W. H. Robinson, Taylors Falls; treasurer, A. C. Herman, St. Paul.

The class graduated from the teacher training course was the largest in the history of the association, or about 400.

A. M. Locker, the state secretary, reported that eighty-five counties in Minnesota have already held their annual conventions and that the convention in Carlton county will soon be held. In these conventions more than 10,000 workers were reached and as many more had been touched through district conventions and institutes.

In the year ending April 1 this year, Secretary Locker traveled 30,100 miles, made 250 addresses and conducted 60 conferences, visited 125 Sunday schools and addressed 25 high schools.

GOVERNOR ISSUES A LETTER

Fears for Primary He Says—Also Attacks Anti-Machine Conference.

St. Paul.—The overshadowing issue of the present state campaign is "preservation of the primary election law," according to an open letter to the voters of the state by Governor A. O. Eberhart and issued by George F. Authier, personal campaign manager for the governor.

"The issue of the campaign," the governor says, "will determine whether or not the people are to retain to themselves the right to make their own nominations or whether they will surrender that right to the self-appointed leaders."

The recent anti-machine conference which indorsed W. E. Lee for governor is attacked as a violation of the spirit of the law, and the governor declares that the delegates represent no one but themselves.

Town of Lenox Platted.

Little Falls.—A corporation has been formed for the purpose of platting a townsite and opening an iron mine at Lenox, a station between here and Brainerd. Little Falls and Brainerd men are interested. The townsite has been platted and the mine will probably be opened as soon as the charter is granted.

Sioux Indians In Convention.

Granite Falls.—Many Sioux Indians assembled at this place for the purpose of attending a religious convention. Indians were present from Minnesota, North and South Dakota and Wisconsin. Several white preachers who understand the Sioux language took part in the proceedings.

Barnesville.—Figures compiled by A. O. Rindahl of the Barnesville Creamery association, show that it is gaining steadily. A gain of 32 per cent in butter receipts for February is noticed over the corresponding month last year. The gain for March over the same month last year was 58 per cent.

Company Pays All Damages.

Mankato.—All of the claims against the Patterson Mercantile company, growing out of the collapse of a portion of the company's building last summer, when a heavy water tank toppled over, have been settled. Ernest Skoog, who sustained the fracture of both legs and other injuries when the bicycle repair shop in which he was employed, was crushed under the ruins, this week received $7,500, and is to have a permanent position with the company. No litigation resulted from the accident.

STATE LEADS IN SECURITIES HELD

HAS $2,354,638.45 MORE INVESTED FROM PERMANENT TRUST FUND THAN 25 OTHERS.

NO BONDED INDEBTEDNESS

Minnesota One of Eight States Free From All Incumbrances of This Nature—Interesting Table Prepared By Treasurer Smith.

St. Paul.—The amount of securities held by the state of Minnesota invested from permanent trust funds is $30,221,418.56. The total amount of these securities of the twenty-five states lying east of the Mississippi river is $27,866,790.11. In other words, the grand total of the securities of all of these states falls short of the Minnesota total by $2,354,638.45.

No Bonded Indebtedness.

Furthermore, Minnesota has no bonded indebtedness, while all but eight of the 25 states referred to are heavily incumbered.

A better idea of the excellent showing which Minnesota makes in these two instances is fully shown in the following table just issued by State Treasurer Walter J. Smith. The comparisons speak for themselves.

IS SELF-CONFESSED FIREBUG

Man Responsible for Dawson Fire May Face Manslaughter Charge.

Dawson. — E. G. Holten, the local restaurant proprietor, who confessed to starting the fire which resulted in the death of two persons, fatal injuries to a third, and a property loss of $65,000 here, may be charged with manslaughter, according to Ernest Simpson, deputy state fire marshal, who was in charge of the investigation here.

Holten admitted to County Attorney Soderburg, and representatives of the state fire marshal's office, that he set fire to the building, after being submitted to a severe sweating. He still denies, however, that he had anything to do with the explosion which partially wrecked four buildings, shattered $4,000 worth of plate glass windows. The joint funeral of the two firemen killed was held at the City hall. The fire departments of Montevideo, Clarkfield, Boyd, Madison and Granite Falls and the Masonic lodge at Madison will attend in a body.

Mother Absolves Driver.

Pipestone.—Robert Hurley, a 5-year-old boy, was run down by an auto and received injuries which may prove fatal. He and a boy friend were playing and, as the automobile of Dr. J. F. Schapler came along, they placed a rope across the street. Mrs. Hurley, mother of the injured boy, witnessed the accident from her home and told the authorities that the boys and not the automobile driver were responsible.

Cat Part Watchdog.

Little Falls.—A. M. Baker of this city has a house cat which exhibits watchdog traits. Whenever any person is heard to approach the Baker residence, the cat growls. When a stranger is in the house, the cat keeps her eye on him and growls continually until he takes his departure. Aside from these peculiarities, the cat is like other cats.

Hastings.—Mrs. Mary Brummer of Rosemount, was granted a divorce from her husband, Hans Brummer, by Judge Albert Johnson by reason of desertion and habitual drunkenness. They were married at Avoca, Minn., Feb. 26, 1906. Vasile Farca, of South St. Paul, was granted a divorce from his wife, Mrs. Maria Farca, on statutory grounds.

Moose Call for Candidate.

St. Paul.—Progressive party men of Minnesota will make another attempt to select a candidate for governor now that Senator O. O. Sageng has declined to run. Hugh T. Halbert, chairman of the state committee, issued a call for a conference in St. Paul April 24 at the Merchants hotel to consider possible candidates for all state offices. Among the men now suggested for the gubernatorial race are Judge M. D. Pardy and Frank M. Nye of Minneapolis, and O. J. Larson of Duluth.

CONFLICT WITH MEXICO IS GENERALLY PREDICTED

HUERTA REFUSES TO SALUTE FLAG; FIGHT PROBABLE

TERMINATION OF NEGOTIATIONS FOLLOWS DICTATOR'S IGNORING OF U. S. DEMANDS.

DECLARATION OF WAR NOT INVOLVED IN CONTROVERSY

Mexican Government Not Recognized As Such, Hence Impossibility of Formal Proceedings—To Seize Ports and Block Harbors.

Washington, April 21.—General Victoriana Huerta, provisional president of Mexico, flatly refused to accede to the unconditional demands of the United States that he salute the American flag, and congress is asked by President Wilson for authority to used armed force to uphold the honor and dignity of the nation.

Negotiations with Huerta over the demand for a salute in reparation for the arrest of American bluejackets at Tampico on April 10, came to a close Sunday night at six o'clock, the last hour given by President Wilson for a favorable response from the Mexican dictator. The final word of Huerta to Charge O'Shaughnessy was a refusal to comply unless the United States would guarantee in writing that his salute be returned.

In the meantime American war fleets have been moving down both coasts on their way to Mexican waters to carry out the president's plan for reprisals.

Can't Declare War.

The crisis thus reached does not mean that there will be a formal declaration of war, because the United States could not declare war against a government which it does not recognize. President Wilson will seek authority, however, to send the armed forces into Mexico to seize first the ports of Tampico and Vera Cruz and the railroad trestle leading from Vera Cruz toward Mexico City.

A cabinet meeting was called at 10:30 o'clock and the final arrangements made for a Pacific blockade of Mexican ports and other steps taken.

The breach that finally has come with Mexico will make it impossible, it is declared on high authority, for the United States further to protect foreigners in that republic and foreign governments have been notified of the situation in this regard.

Committees Meet.

In preparation for the crisis that must be met, Senator Shively, chairman of the senate foreign relations committee and Representative Flood, chairman of the foreign affairs committee, called meetings of these committees. Representative Flood, who is on his honeymoon, telephoned from New York that he would return at once.

A dispatch was received from Charge O'Shaughnessy, saying that General Huerta was willing to accede to the demand of Admiral Mayo providing a protocol was signed and setting forth a copy of the proposed protocol. Charge O'Shaughnessy asked whether he was authorized to sign it.

It was communicated to President Wilson by telephone and at his direction a telegram was sent to Mr. O'Shaughnessy of which the following is a paraphrase:

"The president replied: 'Your reply to O'Shaughnessy is exactly what I should have wished it to be. In no case should any concession of any kind in detail or otherwise be made.'

Wilson insisted that the salute be not fired as a matter of contract or with any stipulation that it be returned by us. It must be fired in accordance with international custom as an apology for the insult offered, General Huerta must trust that the United States will live up to the requirements of international courtesy in returning his salute when it shall have been fired. The proposed protocol is especially objectionable for it is so phrased that General Huerta might construe it as recognizing his government, whereas the president has informed General Huerta and the foreign governments that General Huerta's government will not be recognized.

Admiral Mayo Who Demanded Flag Be Saluted

© HARRIS & EWING.

GIVES THE MANY DETAILS

Washington, April 20.—The navy department has made public a message from Admiral Fletcher, containing Admiral Mayo's original demand for a salute to the flag, addressed in writing by Admiral Mayo to the Mexican General Variagoza, at Tampico.

Admiral's Communication.

The communication was as follows:

"This morning an officer and squad of men of the Mexican military forces arrested and marched through the streets of Tampico a commissioned officer of the United States navy, the paymaster of the Dolphin, together with seven men composing the crew of the whaleboat of the Dolphin. At the time of this arrest the officer and men concerned were unarmed and engaged in loading cases of gasoline which had been purchased on shore. Part of the men were on the shore, but all, including the man or men in the boat, were forced to accompany armed Mexican forces.

"I do not need to tell you that taking men from a boat flying the United States flag is a hostile act, not to be excused. I have already received your verbal message of regret that this event has happened and your statement that it was committed by an ignorant officer. The responsibility for hostile acts cannot be avoided by the plea of ignorance.

"In view of the publicity of this occurrence, I must require that you send by suitable members of your staff formal disavowal and apology for the act, together with your assurance that the officer responsible for it will receive severe punishment. Also that you publicly hoist the United States flag in a prominent position on shore and salute it with twenty-one guns. The salute will be returned by this ship.

"Your answer to this communication should reach me and the called for salute be fired within twenty-four hours from 6 p. m. of this date."

Martial Law for El Paso.

El Paso, Tex., April 20.—Troops at Fort Bliss are under orders to come into this city and place it under martial law the moment there is an appearance of concerted disorder. These instructions were issued by the war department when the Tampico incident first assumed a grave aspect, but just became known. There is a large Mexican population here and the orders to the troops at the fort, five miles from the city, were issued because of the possibility that partisans might start burning buildings or rioting.

Ready to Put to Sea.

Pensacola, Fla., April 21.—The battleship Mississippi, with a fleet of 8 hydro-aeroplanes on board, and the United States torpedo flotilla here, consisting of 22 destroyers and two tenders, the Birmingham and the Dixie, await the flash of the wireless from Admiral Badger on the flagship Arkansas, telling them to put to sea to ojin the fleet on its way to Mexico. It was thought probable that only 14 of the destroyers would sail, and that the others would be held in reserve.

Dreadnaughts to Arrive Wednesday.

On Board the U. S. S. Arkansas, at sea, by wireless, via Key West, April 21.—The United States battleship fleet will anchor off Tampico about 4 o'clock Wednesday afternoon, according to calculations. The South Carolina joined the other battleships Sunday. Rear Admiral Badger expects to establish wireless communication with Rear Admiral Fletcher at Vera Cruz very soon. The main division of the Atlantic fleet passed Key West Sunday morning.

NEW YORK MAYOR NARROWLY ESCAPES

ANOTHER HIT WHEN ATTEMPT IS MADE TO MURDER MAYOR MITCHEL.

IRRESPONSIBLE MAN IS HELD

Elderly Man Fires Into an Automobile Holding Officials Because Executive Would Not See Him.

New York, April 20.—In an attempt to take the life of Mayor John Purroy Mitchel, Michael P. Mahoney, an apparently irresponsible, elderly man, who said he was a blacksmith out of work, fired into group of three men seated in the mayor's automobile, which stood at the east side of City Hall park.

Bullet Hits Another.

The bullet from his revolver entered the jaw of Corporation Counsel Frank L. Polk, who was sitting next to the mayor in the tonneau of the automobile. With blood spurting from his mouth, Mr. Polk was taken into an anti-chamber in the city hall and afterwards to the New York Hospital, where it was said that the wound would not prove fatal.

Mahoney shot at the mayor, he said, in the course of a disjointed statement extracted from him, because he felt aggrieved at the city executive's "extravagant expenditures," and because he was incensed at being turned back from the door of the mayor's room in the City hall on two occasions when he came to apply for a municipal job.

Mayor in Middle.

The mayor sat in the middle of the back seat with Mr. Polk on his right and George V. Mullan, the mayor's former law partner, on his left.

The bullet passed so close to Mayor Mitchel that the left side of his face was scorched.

CLEARS UP VERGARA MYSTERY

Insurance Order Rescued Body From Mexico to Determine Payment Claims.

Omaha, Neb., April 18.—Payment by the Woodmen of the World of an insurance policy on the life of Clemente Vergara, the Texas ranchman, alleged to have been decoyed to the Mexican side of the border and slain by Mexican Federal troops, revealed the fact that the mysterious recovery of Vergara's body from Mexican soil had been accomplished by members of the order.

The proof of death furnished the order, which has headquarters here, gave the information that Vergara had been taken to a lonely island in the Rio Grande by the Federal soldiers and there shot and his body bayoneted. The body, according to the proof of death, was buried by the soldiers.

The casualty department of the order gave out the information that a number of the members of the order had organized and executed the rescue of the body and brought it to American soil where it was restored to the Vergara family.

WANT EMPLOYER OF PERJURER

Eleventh-Hour Witness for Executed Gunmen Says He Received $100.

New York, April 20.—Karl Dresner told District Attorney Whitman the name of the man who, he says, paid him to be an eleventh-hour witness for the four gunmen slayers of the gambler, Herman Rosenthal, before Supreme Justice Goff. Detectives were sent out to find the man named by Dresner, who is in the Tombs as a self-confessed perjurer because of the testimony he gave in the final effort of the gunmen to obtain a new trial.

The price Dresner received for his false story before Justice Goff was $100, according to his reported statements to Mr. Whitman.

Omaha D. A. R. Member Killed.

Omaha, Neb., April 18.—Mrs. Presley J. Barr, aged 58, for years prominent in the Nebraska Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, was instantly killed by being run down by a heavy motor truck as she was crossing a down-town street. Her daughter-in-law, Mrs. L. E. Barr of Missouri Valley, Iowa, who was with her, was seriously injured.

Wage Settlement Is Favored.

Albia, Iowa, April 20.—Returns received here from 69 out of 86 locals in District 13 of the United Mine Workers of America indicate that the plan of the policy committee to settle the wage controversy with the adoption of the old scale has carried by a majority of about 2,500.

Outlaws Shoot Third Man.

Escanaba, Mich., April 20.—Members of the Escanaba naval reserves did guard duty on roads leading into a swamp 16 miles from Escanaba. The third man to be shot in the bandit chase, Edward Reagon, limped into town with a bullet through his leg. He met the bandits near Soo Junction and they shot him in the leg. Two bandits, Clyde Smith and Joe Parent, visited the Reynolds lumbering camp, secured breakfast and more ammunition and left again.

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in a road house near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city and identifies the body. A young woman who accompanied Wrandall to the inn and subsequently disappeared, is suspected. Wrandall, it appears, had led a gay life and neglected his wife. Mrs. Wrandall starts back for New York in an auto during a blinding snow storm. On the way she meets a young woman in the road who proves to be the woman who killed Wrandall. Feeling that the girl had done her a service in ridding her of the man, who though she loved him deeply, had caused her great sorrow. Mrs. Wrandall determines to shield her and takes her to her own home.

CHAPTER III.—Continued.

Half an hour later he departed, to rejoin her at eleven o'clock, when the reporters were to be expected. He was to do all the talking for her. While he was there, Leslie Wrandall called her up on the telephone. Hearing but one side of the rather prolonged conversation, he was filled with wonder at the tactful way in which she met and parried the inevitable questions and suggestions coming from her horror-stricken brother-in-law. Without the slightest trace of offensiveness in her manner, she gave Leslie to understand that the final obsequies must be conducted in the home of his parents, to whom once more her husband belonged, and that she would abide by all arrangements his family elected to make. Mr. Carroll surmised from the trend of conversation that young Wrandall was about to leave for the scene of the tragedy, and that the house was in a state of unspeakable distress. The lawyer smiled rather grimly to himself as he turned to look out of the window. He did not have to be told that Challis was the idol of the family, and that, so far as they were concerned, he could do no wrong!

After his departure, Mrs. Wrandall gently opened the bedroom door and was surprised to find the girl wide-awake, resting on one elbow, her staring eyes fastened on the newspaper that topped the pile on the chair.

Catching sight of Mrs. Wrandall she pointed to the paper with a trembling hand and cried out, in a voice full of horror:

"Did you place them there for me to read? Who was with you in the other room just now? Was it some one about the—some one looking for me? Speak! Please tell me. I heard a man's voice—"

The other crossed quickly to her side.

"Don't be alarmed. It was my lawyer. There is nothing to fear—at present. Yes, I left the papers there for you to see. You can see what a sensation it has caused. Challis Wrandall was one of the most widely known men in New York. But I suppose you know that without my telling you."

The girl sank back with a groan. "My God, what have I done? What will come of it all?"

"I wish I could answer that question," said the other, taking the girl's hand in hers. Both were trembling. After an instant's hesitation, she laid her other hand in the dark, dishevelled hair of the wild-eyed creature, who still continued to stare at the headlines. "I am quite sure they will not look for you here, or in my home."

"In your home?"

"You are to go with me. I have thought it all over. It is the only way. Come, I must ask you to pull yourself together. Get up at once, and dress. Here are the things you are to wear." She indicated the orderly pile of garments with a wave of her hand.

Slowly the girl crept out of bed, confused, bewildered, stunned.

"Where are my own things? I—I cannot accept these. Pray give me my own—"

Mrs. Wrandall checked her.

"You must obey me, if you expect me to help you. Don't you understand that I have had a—a bereavement? I cannot wear these things now. They are useless to me. But we will speak of all that later on. Come, be quick; I will help you to dress. First, go to the telephone and ask them to send a waiter to—these rooms. We must have something to eat. Please do as I tell you."

Standing before her benefactress, her fingers fumbling impotently at the neck of the night-dress, the girl still continued to stare dumbly into the calm, dark eyes before her.

"You are so good. I—I—"

"Let me help you," interrupted the other, deliberately setting about to remove the night-dress. The girl caught it up as it slipped from her shoulders, a warm flush suffusing her face, a shamed look springing into her eyes.

"Thank you, I can—get on very well. I only wanted to ask you a question. It has been on my mind, waking and sleeping. Can you tell me anything about—do you know his wife?"

The question was so abrupt, so startling that Mrs. Wrandall uttered a sharp little cry. For a moment she could not reply.

"I am so sorry, so desperately sorry for her," added the girl plaintively.

"I know her," the other managed to say with an effort.

"If I had only known that he had a wife—" began the girl bitterly, almost angrily.

Mrs. Wrandall grasped her by the arm. "You did not know that he had a wife?" she cried.

The girl's eyes flashed with a sudden, fierce fire in their depths.

"God in heaven, no! I did not know it until— Oh, I can't speak of it! Why should I tell you about it? Why should you be interested in hearing it?"

Mrs. Wrandall drew back and regarded the girl's set, unhappy face. There was a curious light in her eyes that escaped the other's notice—a light that would have puzzled her not a little.

"But you will tell me—everything—a little later," she said, strangely calm. "Not now, but—before many hours have passed. First of all, you must tell me who you are, where you live—everything except what happened in Burton's inn. I don't want to hear that at present—perhaps never. Yes, on second thoughts, I will say never! You are never to tell me just what happened up there, or just what led up to it. Do you understand? Never!"

The girl stared at her in amazement. "But I—I must tell some one," she cried vehemently. "I have a right to defend myself—"

"I am not asking you to defend yourself," said Mrs. Wrandall shortly. Then, as if afraid to remain longer, she rushed from the room. In the doorway, she turned for an instant to say: "Do as I told you. Telephone. Dress as quickly as you can." She closed the door swiftly.

Standing in the center of the room, her hands clenched until the nails cut the flesh, she said over and over again to herself: "I don't want to know! I don't want to know!"

A few minutes later she was critically inspecting the young woman who came from the bedroom attired in a street dress that neither of them had ever donned before. The girl, looking fresher, prettier and even younger than when she had seen her last, was in no way abashed. She seemed to have accepted the garments and the situation in the same spirit of resignation and hope; as if she had decided to make the most of her slim chance to profit by these amazing circumstances.

They sat opposite each other at the little breakfast table.

"Please pour the coffee," said Mrs. Wrandall. The waiter had left the room at her command. The girl's hand shook, but she complied without a word.

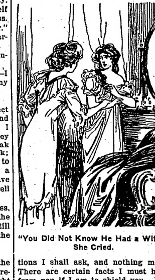
"Now you may tell me who you are and—but wait! You are not to say anything about what happened at the inn. Guard your words carefully. I am not asking for a confession. I do not care to know what happened there. It will make it easier for me to protect you. You may call it conscience. Keep your big secret to yourself. Not one word to me. Do you understand?"

"You mean that I am not to reveal, even to you, the causes which led up to—"

"Nothing—absolutely nothing," said Mrs. Wrandall firmly.

"But I cannot permit you to judge me, to—well, you might say to acquit me—without hearing the story. It is so vital to me."

"I can judge you without hearing all of the—the evidence, if that's what you mean. Simply answer the questions I shall ask, and nothing more. There are certain facts I must have from you if I am to shield you. You must tell me the truth. I take it you are an English girl. Where do you live? Who are your friends? Where is your family?"



"You Did Not Know He Had a Wife?" She Cried.

The girl's face flushed for an instant and then grew pale again.

"I will tell you the truth," she said. "My name is Hetty Castleton. My father is Col. Braid Castleton of —— of the British army. My mother is dead. She was Kitty Glynn, at one time a popular music hall performer in London. She was Irish. She died two years ago. My father was a gentleman. I do not say he is a gentleman, for his treatment of my mother relieves him from that distinction. He is in the far east, China, I think. I have not seen him in more than five years. He deserted my mother. That's all there is to that side of my story. I appeared in two or three of the musical pieces produced in London two seasons ago, in the chorus. I never got beyond that, for very good reasons. I was known as Hetty Glynn. Three weeks ago I started for New York, sailing from Liverpool. Previously I had served in the capacity of governess in the family of John Budlong, a brewer. They had a son, a young man of twenty. Two months ago I was dismissed. A California lady, Mrs. Holcombe, offered me a situation as governess to her two little girls soon afterward. I was to go to her home in San Francisco. She provided the money necessary for the voyage and for other expenses. She is still in Europe. I landed in New York a fortnight ago and, following her directions, presented myself at a certain bank—I have the name somewhere—where my railroad tickets were to be in readiness for me, with further instructions. They were to give me twenty-five pounds on the presentation of my letter from Mrs. Holcombe. They gave me the money and then handed me a cablegram from Mrs. Holcombe, notifying me that my services would not be required. There was no explanation. Just that.

"On the steamer I met—him. His deck chair was next to mine. I noticed that his name was Wrandall—'C. Wrandall' the card on the chair informed me. I—"

"You crossed on the steamer with him?" interrupted Mrs. Wrandall quickly.

"Yes."

"Had—had you seen him before? In London?—"

"Never. Well, we became acquainted, as people do. He—he was very handsome and agreeable." She paused for a moment to collect herself.

"Very handsome and agreeable," said the other slowly.

"We got to be very good friends. There were not many people on board, and apparently he knew none of them. It was too cold to stay on deck much of the time, and it was very rough. He had one of the splendid suites on the—"

"Pray omit unnecessary details. You landed and went—where?"

"He advised me to go to an hotel—I can't recall the name. It was rather an unpleasant place. Then I went to the bank, as I have stated. After that I did not know what to do. I was stunned, bewildered. I called him up on the telephone and—he asked me to meet him for dinner at a queer little cafe, far down town. We—"

"And you had no friends, no acquaintances here?"

"No. He suggested that I go into one of the musical shows, saying he thought he could arrange it with a manager who was a friend. Anything to tide me over, he said. But I would not consider it, not for a instant. I had had enough of the stage. I—I am really not fitted for it. Besides, I am qualified—well qualified—to be governess—but that is neither here nor there. I had some money—perhaps forty pounds. I found lodgings with some people in Nineteenth street. He never came there to see me. I can see plainly now why he argued it would not be—well, he used the word 'wise.' But we went occasionally to dine together. We went about in a motor—a little red one. He—he told me he loved me. That was one night about a week ago. I—"

"I don't care to hear about it," cried the other. "No need of that. Spare me the silly side of the story."

"Silly, madam? In God's name, do you think it was silly to me? Why—why, I believed him! And, what is more, I believe that he did love me—even now I believe it."

"I have no doubt of it," said Mrs. Wrandall calmly. "You are very pretty—and charming."

"I—I did not know that he had a wife until—well, until—" She could not go on.

"Night before last."

The girl shuddered. Mrs. Wrandall turned her face away and waited.

"There is nothing more I can tell you, unless you permit me to tell all," the girl resumed after a moment of hesitation.

Mrs. Wrandall arose.

"I have heard enough. This afternoon I will send my butler with you to the lodging house in Nineteenth street. He will attend to the removal of your personal effects to my home, and you will return with him. It will be testing fate, Miss Castleton, this visit to your former abiding place, but I have decided to give the law its chance. If you are suspected, a watch will be set over the house in which is quite unknown, you will run no risk in going there openly, nor will I be taking so great a chance as may appear in offering you a home, for the time being at least, as companion—or secretary or whatever we may elect to call it for the benefit of all inquirers. Are you willing to run the risk—this single risk?"

"Perfectly willing," announced the other without hesitation. Indeed, her face brightened. "If they are waiting there for me, I shall go with them without a word. I have no means of expressing my gratitude to you for—"

"There is time enough for that," said Mrs. Wrandall quickly. "And if they are not there, you will return to me? You will not desert me now?"

The girl's eyes grew wide with wonder. "Desert you? Why do you put it in that way? I don't understand."

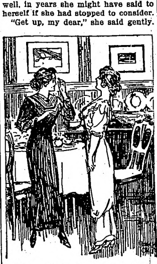
"You will come back to me?" insisted the other.

"Yes. Why—why, it means everything to me. It means life—more than that, most wonderful friend. Life isn't very sweet to me. But the joy of giving it to you for ever is the dearest boon I crave. I do give it to you. It belongs to you. I—I could die for you."

She dropped to her knees and pressed her lips to Sara Wrandall's hand; hot tears fell upon it.

Mrs. Wrandall laid her free hand on the dark, glossy hair and smiled; smiled warmly for the first time in—well, in years she might have said to herself if she had stopped to consider.

"Get up, my dear," she said gently.



"I Am Challis Wrandall's Wife."

"I shall not ask you to die for me—if you do come back. I may be sending you to your death, as it is, but it is the chance we must take. A few hours will tell the tale. Now listen to what I am about to say—to propose. I offer you a home, I offer you friendship and I trust security from the peril that confronts you. I ask nothing in return, not even a word of gratitude. You may tell the people at your lodgings that I have engaged you as companion and that we are to sail for Europe in a week's time if possible. Now we must prepare to go to my own home. You will see to packing my—that is, our trunks—"

"Oh, it—it must be a dream!" cried Hetty Castleton, her eyes swimming. "I can't believe—" Suddenly she caught herself up, and tried to smile. "I don't see why you do this for me. I do not deserve—"

"You have done me a service," said Mrs. Wrandall, her manner so peculiar that the girl again assumed the stare of perplexity and wonder that had been paramount since their meeting; as if she were on the verge of grasping a great truth.

"What can you mean?"

Sara laid her hands on the girl's shoulders and looked steadily into the puzzled eyes for a moment before speaking.

"My girl," she said, ever so gently, "I shall not ask what your life has been; I do not care. I shall not ask for references. You are alone in the world and you need a friend. I too am alone. If you will come to me I will do everything in my power to make you comfortable and—contented. Perhaps it will be impossible to make you happy. I promise faithfully to help you, to shield you, to repay you for the thing you have done for me. You could not have fallen into gentler hands than mine will prove to be. That much I swear to you on my soul, which is sacred. I bear you no ill-will. I have nothing to avenge."

Hetty drew back, completely mystified.

"Who are you?" she murmured, still staring.

"I am Challis Wrandall's wife."

CHAPTER IV.

While the Mob Waited.

The next day but one, in the huge old-fashioned mansion of the Wrandalls in lower Fifth avenue, in the drawing-room directly beneath the chamber in which Challis was born, the impressive but grimly conventional funeral services were held.

Contrasting sharply with the somber, absolutely correct atmosphere of the gloomy interior was the exterior display of joyous curiosity that must have jarred severely on the high-bred sensibilities of the chief mourners, not to speak of the invited guests who had been obliged to pass between rows of gaping bystanders in order to reach the portals of the house of grief, and who must have reckoned with extreme distaste the cost of subsequent departure. A dozen raucous-voiced policemen were employed to keep back the hundreds that thronged the sidewalk and blocked the street. Curiosity was rampant. Ever since the moment that the body of Challis Wrandall was carried into the house of his father, a motley, varying crowd of people shifted restlessly in front of the mansion, filled with gruesome interest in the absolutely unseen, animated by the sly hope that something sensational might happen if they waited long enough.

Motor after motor, carriage after carriage, rolled up to the curb and emptied its sober-faced, self-conscious occupants in front of the door with the great black bow; with each arrival the crowd surged forward, and names were uttered in undertones, passing from lip to lip until every one in the street knew that Mr. So-and-So, Mrs. This-or-That, the What-Do-You-Call-Ems and others of the city's most exclusive but most garishly advertised society leaders had entered the house of mourning. It was a great show for the plebeian spectators. Much better than Miss So-and-So's wedding, said one woman who had attended the aforesaid ceremony as a unit in the well-dressed mob that almost wrecked the carriages in the desire to see the terrified bride. Better than a circus, said a man who held his little daughter above the heads of the crowd so that she might see the fine lady in a wild-beast fur. Swellest funeral New York ever had, remarked another, excepting one 'way back when he was a kid.

At the corner below stood two patrol wagons, also waiting.

Inside the house sat the carefully selected guests, hushed and stiff and gratified. (Not because they were attending a funeral, but because the occasion served to separate them from the chaff; they were the elect.) It would be going too far to intimate that they were proud of themselves, but it is not stretching it very much to say that they counted noses with considerable satisfaction and were glad that they had not been left out. The real, high-water mark in New York society was established at this memorable function. As one after the other arrived and was ushered into the huge drawing-room, he or she was accorded a congratulatory look from those already assembled, a tribute returned with equal amiability. Each one noted who else was there, and each one said to himself that at last they really had something all to themselves. It was truly a pleasure, a relief, to be able to do something without being pushed about by people who didn't belong but thought they did. They sat back—stiffly, of course—and in utter stillness confessed that there could be such a thing as the survival of the fittest. Yes, there wasn't a nose there that couldn't be counted with perfect serenity. It was a notable occasion.

Mrs. Wrandall, the elder, had made out the list. She did not consult her daughter-in-law in the matter. It is true that Sara forestalled her in a way by sending word, through Leslie, that she would be pleased if Mrs. Wrandall would issue invitations to as many of Challis' friends as she deemed advisable. As for herself, she had no wish in the matter; she would be satisfied with whatever arrangements the family cared to make.

It is not to be supposed, from the foregoing, that Mrs. Wrandall, the elder, was not stricken to the heart by the lamentable death of her idol. He was her idol. He was her first-born, he was her love-born. He came to her in the days when she loved her husband without much thought of respecting him. She was beginning to regard him as something more than a lover when Leslie came, so it was different. When their daughter Vivian was born, she was plainly annoyed but wholly respectful. Mr. Wrandall was no longer the lover; he was her lord and master. The head of the house of Wrandall was a person to be looked up to, to be respected and admired by her, for he was a very great man, but he was dear to her only because he was the father of Challis, the first-born.

In the order of her nature, Challis therefore was her most dearly beloved, Vivian the least desired and last in her affections as well as in sequence.

Strangely enough, the three of them perfected a curiously significant record of conjugal endowments. Challis had always been the wild, wayward, unrestrained one, and by far the most lovable; Leslie, almost as good looking but with scarcely a noticeable trace of charm that made his brother attractive; Vivian, handsome, selfish and as cheerless as the wind that blows across the icebergs in the north. Challis had been born with a widely enveloping heart and an elastic conscience; Leslie with a brain and a soul and not much of a heart, as things go; Vivian with a soul alone, which belonged to God, after all, and not to her. Of course she had a heart, but it was only for the purpose of pumping blood to remote extremities, and had nothing whatever to do with anything so unutterably extraneous as love, charity or self-sacrifice.

As for Mr. Redmond Wrandall he was a very proper and dignified gentleman, and old for his years.

It may be seen, or rather surmised, that if the house of Wrandall had not been so admirably centered under its own vine and fig tree, it might have become divided against itself without much of an effort.

Mrs. Redmond Wrandall was the vine and fig tree.

And now they had brought her dearly beloved son home to her, murdered and—disgraced. If it had been either of the others, she could have said: "God's will be done." Instead, she cried out that God had turned against her.

Leslie had had the bad taste—or perhaps it was misfortune—to blurt out an agonized "I told you so" at a time when the family was sitting numb and hushed under the blight of the first horrid blow. He did not mean to be unfeeling. It was the truth bursting from his unhappy lips.

"I knew Chal would come to this—I knew it," he had said. His arm was about the quivering shoulders of his mother as he said it.

She looked up, a sob breaking in her throat. For a long time she looked into the face of her second son.

"How can you—how dare you say such a thing as that?" she cried, aghast.

He colored, and drew her closer to him.

"I—I didn't mean it," he faltered.

"You have always taken sides against him," began his mother.

"Please, mother," he cried miserably.

"You say this to me now," she went on. "You who are left to take his place in my affection—why, Leslie, I—I"

Vivian interposed. "Les is upset, mamma darling. You know he loved Challis as deeply as any of us loved him."

Afterwards the girl said to Leslie when they were quite alone: "She will never forgive you for that, Les. It was a beastly thing to say."

He bit his lip, which trembled. "She's never cared for me as she cared for Chal. I'm sorry if I've made it worse."

"See here, Leslie, was Chal so—so—"

"Yes. I meant what I said a while ago. It was sure to happen to him one time or another. Sara's had a lot to put up with."

"Sara! If she had been the right sort of a wife, this never would have happened."

"After all is said and done, Vivie, Sara's in a position to rub it in on us if she's of a mind to do so. She won't do it, of course, but—I wonder if she isn't gloating, just the same."

"Haven't we treated her as one of us?" demanded she, dabbing her handkerchief in her eyes. "Since the wedding, I mean. Haven't we been kind to her?"

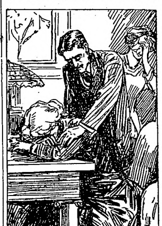
"Oh, I think she understands us perfectly," said her brother.

"I wonder what she will do now?" mused Vivian, in that speech casting her sister-in-law out of her narrow little world as one would throw aside a burnt-out match.

"She will profit by experience," said he, with some pleasure in a superior wisdom.

* * * * * * * *

In Mrs. Wrandall's sitting room at the top of the broad stairway sat the family—that is to say, the immediate family—a solemn-faced footman in front of the door that stood fully ajar so that the occupants might hear the words of the minister as they ascended, sonorous and precise, from the hall below. A minister was he who knew the buttered side of his bread. His discourse was to be a beautiful one. He stood at the front of the stairs and faced the assembled listeners in the hall, the drawing room and the entresol, but his infinitely touching words went up one flight and lodged.



He Did Not Mean to Be Unfeeling.

Sara Wrandall sat a little to the left of and behind Mrs. Redmond Wrandall, about whom were grouped the three remaining Wrandalls, father, son and daughter, closely drawn together. Well to the fore were Wrandall uncles and cousins and aunts, and one or two carefully chosen blood relations to the mistress of the house, whose hand had long been set against kinsmen of less exalted promise.

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879

We note that quite a number of our exchanges are calling the execution of the four gun men convicted of willful murder in New York, for hire, cruel. We take an entirely different view of this matter than some of our brethern of the Press. Our opinion is, that when one man will hire out to murder another man for a price, as was done in this case, that Mr. gunman should be strapped into an electric chair and the button touched. This is the only way to lassen the number of murders, particulary in large cities where professional assassinators make their home. These four men had nothing against their victim, in fact they did not know him at all but hired out to kill him. If this man, Rosenthal, that was murdered, had been your brother or father, you would not be so free with your hog wash sympathy for the men who shot him. We are radically in favor of the prompt execution of cold blooded murderers, as that is the quickest and best way to give a warning to other criminals. In cases of this kind let electrician Davis touch the button.

TALK VERSUS ACTION.

The newspaper advocates of Governor Eberhart declare hotly that all this talk about economy and efficiency in state government is plain theft of the governor's thunder.

Has he not been urging economy and efficiency in all his messages for years and years and years.

Well, then, he is the original booster for economy and efficiency. All others are mere echoes and imitations.

Now it is true that Governor Eberhart has had this sort of talk in his messages to the legislature for several years.

But if we were a supporter of the governor we doubt very much if we should have the nerve to talk about it.

Mr. Eberhart became governor in September, 1909. He has been governor ever since.

In 1910 Minnesota's state tax rate was 2.7 mills. This year it is 5.03 mills—an increase in four years of EIGHTY-SIX PER CENT.

In 1910 the state treasury disbursed $13,145,734. This year it will spend $21,771,680—an increase of SIXTY-SIX PER CENT.

While these state taxes which are paid by the merchant and banker, the farmer and working man, have been increasing at this appalling rate, indirect taxes have also been increasing at a prodigious pace—a rate that SHOULD have brought about a reduction in direct state taxes and the direct state tax rate. Direct taxes and tax rates have increased enormously—far more than in any other state of the Union—while railroad taxes, for instance have increased from $2,972,792 in 1909 to more than five millions this year!

Meanwhile, Governor Eberhart has been TALKING about efficiency and economy! Just talking you see; for he has vetoed no bill enlarging the state's appropriations, he has brought about no increased economy or efficiency in any department under his control, he has done nothing whatever but TALK.

The point—which the governor's friends strangely seem to have missed—is that the time has come when ACTION, not mere TALK, is demanded.

Which is ONE of the reasons why a great many people want a change in the state house.—The Duluth Herald.

A. B. Mandt has filed for the nomination for re election for County Commissioner from his district. Mr. Mandt has made a first class record on his first term, and will undoubtedly be renominated and elected by a large majority.

Theoline Goodwin has duly filed for the nomination for Superintendent of Schools, and as Mr. Mostue has filed, the scrap for that office is on tap.

We understand that Fred I. Farley will be a candidate for the office of County Attorney of Red Lake County, and he certainly will make a good man for the position.

The Plummer Pioneer has again changed hands, and we understand that it will now be removed to Oklee, which would leave Plummer without a newspaper.

J. A. Swore will make a strong canvas for the nomination for County Treasurer, and we understand that he is the popular candidate in the city of Thief River Falls.

President Wilson's action in the Mexico matter will meet the hearty approval of the American people, as it cannot be said that he plunged the country into a needless war, but has handled the situation carefully, and in a business manner. Now that actual war seems unpreventable let the country stand solidly behind the president, and let him feel that he is backed up by the American people without regard to party. Or to speak in plain words let us clean up that back yard first, and have our party rows afterwards.

Our rate is $5.00 for a short political announcement. If you want to tell the people what you have been doing and expect to do in the future, 5 cents a line will be the rate to the June Primaries.

The road running north from Highlanding should have the prompt attention of our town road boss, as it should be made in a good passable condition, as it will be the main road to the end of the new Electric Line.

All that post master Singer can say against A. B. Mandt will not hurt him much, for every one knows that he is mad at Mandt, because Mandt beat Singer so bad for the same office two years ago. Now he wants one of his tools to run against Mandt, and has picked Peterson.

Singer Bros. the Kratka post masters have placed a candidate in the field to oppose A. B. Mandt for County Commissioner. Of course if you farmers want a man to look after Singer's interest, and who is located down near Thief River Falls, vote for Peterson. If you want a man that will look after the interest of this end of the district, vote for Mandt.

We received a letter from a party last night saying that he had to support O'neill. Well that man has our heartfelt sympathy, if for any reason, he has to support a man who misrepresented northern Minnesota in the last legislature we are sorry for him. The trouble with a large number of people is that they are "hide bound" on county option. They only watch how their representative votes on this one question, and if he votes for "option" he can sell them out body and soul on every other vital question and they are ready to take off their hat and holler for his re election.

The Congressmen from this state who voted against the passage of this resolution voted as individuals, and not as representatives of the people, and a few breaks of this kind will cause the people of Minnesota to wake up and elect men to Congress who will represent them.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

To the Voters of the new 65th District, composed of the Counties of Pennington, Clearwater and Red Lake:

I hereby announce myself as a candidate for Representative for the said district. I solicit your support and votes at the primaries to be held June 16th, 1914.

I have been a resident of the District for the past thirty-two years and have I believe, grown to know the wants and needs of the citizens of the district, and as political platforms have been eliminated by the Non-Partisan Election Law, I therefore hold it to be the duty of all persons seeking legislative honors to declare themselves upon public questions affecting the welfare, health and morals of the people of the State

If nominated and elected, I pledge myself to use my best efforts and ability to work for the following legislation:

Legislation for economy and efficiency in State Administration of business affairs for the purpose of lightening the burden of the present high taxes.

I favor putting the telephones of the state under the supervision of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission and compelling physical connection of lines and regulation of rates.

I shall encourage the adoption of the Revolving Fund Amendment, known as House File No. 1242. Also the Initiative Referendum Amendment.

Equal suffrage for women.

I favor the sale of foreign bonds held by the State of Minnesota, and the investment of the permanent funds of the State in improving our own state, instead of loaning them to other states at a low rate of interest. The money should be used to finance our Counties, Cities, Drainage Projects, School Districts and Loans on Resident Farm Property.

I favor the increase in the royalties paid the State when the present mineral leases expire.

I favor Consolidation and Reduction of the State Board Commissions in the interests of economy.

I favor the submission of the liquor question to the vote of the people, to the end that communities where they are of the opinion that right living and higher morals may be attained by the elimination of liquor, may at least have an opportunity of putting their views to the test.

I also favor liberal allowances for advertising the resources of the State with a view of reducing immigration.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of the condition in the rural communities.

Hoping you will give my platform due consideration and favor me with your franchise, I am most

Respectfully,
JOHN A. DUFFY.

TEXAS RANGER ON PICKET DUTY

SHOWING EQUIPMENT CARRIED BY THE RANGERS

TEXAS RANGER READY FOR ACTION

CLEMENTE VERGARA, whose ranch near Palafox, Texas, is situated on an island in the Rio Grand, missed his horses one morning. He learned that they had been taken across the border and he had reason to believe that Captain Rodriguez of the Mexican army had taken them. He voiced his suspicions rather freely, so much so that the matter is thought to have reached the ears of the federal leader.

On Friday, February 13, Vergara was invited to cross the border into Mexico, intimations having been made to him that he could learn about his lost property. He went at the invitation of federal troops.

He did not return, but for some time there was little uneasiness about him. He knew the country thereabouts and his friends thought he could take care of himself. Finally, as the time of his absence grew longer, an investigation was started, first by Texas and then by the American government. Not much came of it except that Mr. Garrett, consul of Neuvo Laredo, reported that he believed the American had been murdered.

Reports began to drift across to the United States side of the river that a man answering the description of Vergara had been seen hanging by the neck on the outskirts of Hidalgo, a little Mexican town five miles from Vergara's ranch. Later, Mexicans told that they knew where Vergara's body had been buried—in the old cemetery at Hidalgo.

No definite action having been taken to procure the body, in so far as either government was concerned, the friends of Vergara grew somewhat irritated. Gov. O. B. Colquitt of Texas asked the American state department for permission to send a company of his rangers across the border to make a more rigid investigation.

Mr. Bryan notified Governor Colquitt that such action could not be taken by one state—that it was strictly in the province of the federal government to undertake such deeds. And the federal government did not undertake the matter.

On the morning of Sunday, March 8, at three o'clock, the body of Clemente Vergara was brought across the Rio Grande by a party of Americans and placed on American soil. Consul Garrett was notified, and went to the place where he had been told the body lay. It was there.

No one seems to know who brought the body back from the Mexican cemetery. All Governor Colquitt would say was:

"We wanted Vergara's body and we have it."

All deny that the rangers recovered it—but no one can offer a reliable reason for thinking others did it, according to those who have watched the incident closely.

This incident has served to bring into the public eye what undoubtedly is the most picturesque body of legalized fighting men in this country. The Texas Rangers have no counterpart in the world. Only forty in number, they are equal to almost any emergency that may arise when it comes to putting to a test real fighting qualities. The presence of one solitary ranger upon a scene of disorder and threatened lawlessness has in innumerable instances been sufficient to quickly restore peace and uphold the dignity of the law.

The ranger organization was created about forty years ago and was established primarily for the purpose of frontier protection. But Texas no longer has a frontier. The ragged edges of civilization which once existed along the Rio Grande border and in the vast plains country of western Texas have disappeared. And the conquest of this formerly turbulent region, infested with various and divers bands of outlaws, must be attributed largely to the exercise of unexcelled bravery, endurance, and expert markmanship on the part of the brave bands of men who have at different times comprised the ranger organization.

In the old days the rangers had the distinction of being the real gun-fighting men of the world, and this distinction still belongs to them. Their methods of operation are different today, however, although the little army of men now in the state's service is just as brave and as expert in the use of the rifle and pistol as in the time when their chief occupation was fighting bands of depredating Indians or running down the bandits of the borders.

A movement was started some months ago to disband the rangers on the ground that their services are no longer necessary and that they are used chiefly to perform the duties that properly belong to the peace officers of the different counties. But the fact that they were the first to be called upon when protection was demanded in connection with the Mexican misunderstanding has, probably, put an end to this movement for all time. Besides, Texans, as a whole, have such a sentimental pride in the wonderful deeds of valor of their rangers that it is doubtful if such a movement would have terminated differently under any circumstances.

From the time the ranger organization was first established its members have been picked men, proved experts in markmanship, at home in the saddle and absolutely fearless in the face of any danger. In addition, they are required to be of good moral character, which means that they do not drink, or gamble. The most of them were formerly cowboys, and when they leave the ranger service they usually return to the ranch.

"The way I did," said Capt. "Bill" McDonald, who saw many years in the service, "was to look into a man's eye, and I could tell in a minute if he had the right stuff in him to make a good ranger. I never got fooled, either."

"There are some folks," continued the captain, "who think that because the boys are always ready to fight like a bunch of wildcats they must be a reckless, rowdy set of men. But they are wrong. The rangers are just naturally as peaceful and God-fearing men as you'll find anywhere. There's Capt. John R. Hughes, for instance. He's been a ranger for nearly thirty years, and he's killed a lot of men, but he's a great Sunday school worker. A few months ago he was ordered from his station, Ysleta, where he was superintendent of the Sunday school, to put down the bootlegging that was going on in that part of the Panhandle region, and the children of the town made a big fuss to the governor about moving his headquarters away."

It may be remarked of Captain McDonald himself that a few years ago he shot and killed four Mexicans who were firing upon him from ambush in a remote locality of the lower Rio Grande border, the next Sunday he was back in Brownsville and occupied a front seat in one of the churches at morning and evening services.

The conditions existing along the Texas frontier at the time the rangers were organized, in 1876, were a source of much concern to this government. The cattle raids from the state of Tamaulapis, Mexico, into Texas commenced with what is known as the "Cortina war," in 1859 and 1860. This was a most remarkable occurrence—one without parallel in our history. A single lawless ranchero with a band of friends captured a town of nearly three thousand inhabitants, and not only defied, but defeated the forces of the state of Texas, and carried on a war against the combined forces of the state of Texas and the United States, maintaining himself for upwards of five months on American soil, with the Mexican flag flying over his camp, and finally retreated across the Rio Grande, ready to renew the fight.

Such was the remarkable commencement of the border troubles on the Rio Grande, one well calculated to inspire the lawless element in Mexico with defiant pride, and to teach the American people the extent of the danger to which they were exposed, and their dependence for safety on the strong arm of the government. These feelings were confirmed and increased when the bold robber and outlaw, who was under numerous indictments in Texas for previous killings and robberies and who had left the American territory in defiant warfare with the United States, was deliberately sent by the Mexican government, clothed with the high office of general of the army and governor, back to the very scene of his outrages, and the United States quietly submitted to the insult.

The whole country, from Brownsville to Rio Grande City, 120 miles, and back to the Arroyo Colorado, was laid waste. There was not an American, nor any property belonging to an American, that was not destroyed, in this large tract of country. Their horses and cattle were driven across into Mexico and there sold—a cow and a calf by her side for a dollar.

Although cattle stealing was the original object of the raids, the lawless bands engaged in them were necessarily left to the perpetration of other and greater crimes. The lawless spirit engendered by their trade, and their own protection, caused them to kill travelers who happened to meet them on their raids, and those whom they thought might inform against them. In fact, these raids were soon turned into general robbery and slaughter.

These conditions on the lower Rio Grande began to improve, however, as soon as Capt. L. H. McNally and his company of rangers were sent down there to run down the outlaws. No quarter was asked or given; it was a fight to the death when he and his men got within shooting distance of the Mexican thieves. Even international law had no meaning for them at such times. On one occasion they chased a band of about fifty cattle thieves across the river into Mexico, killing 29 of them without a man of their own being killed.

A name which for many years struck terror into the heart of border criminals was that of Capt. Lee Hall. Captain Hall, who is now over sixty, was at the head of a company of rangers, which covered a territory as large as two or three ordinary states. They were a flying squadron that rode fearlessly into any kind of trouble where duty called them, and their battles with the Indians, the lawless white men and Mexicans were so numerous that they were in almost constant active service for three or four years. So much was Captain Hall feared by those who had reason to dread the ranger service that numerous attempts were made to assassinate him, the room in which he slept being fired into several times at night.

One summer day about fifteen years ago Captain Hall and his men were taking a short rest in their camp in the Big Bend country, a wild and remote region bordering the upper Rio Grande, and much frequented as a rendezvous by many murderers, robbers, smugglers and a great variety of other criminals, when a messenger rode in with the news that a Southern Pacific train had been held up and robbed near Dryden, a hundred and fifty miles away. The word to be up and off was immediately given, and as the rangers have neither tents nor chuck wagon to hinder their movements, but only a blanket under which to sleep and a small sack or two in which to carry their commissary supplies, it was only a few minutes until they were headed across a trailless country for the scene of the robbery. By daylight next morning they had made sixty miles of the journey. Then leaving their tired horses at a ranch house, they snatched an hour's sleep, roped fresh horses from the corral, saddled them and were off again.

The trail of the robbers was picked up about twenty miles from Dryden, and it was discovered that they were headed north, with a posse of United States marshals already on the chase. By making a detour the rangers were enabled to hit the trail again, ahead of the deputy marshals. On the fourth day after breaking camp they came within sight of the outlaws, and the shooting began as soon as the rangers and fugitives were within firing distance. One of the robbers was killed at the first fire, and the second, seeing his escape cut off, climbed to a point within sight of the rangers and deliberately blew out his brains.

TEETH IN SHOVEL AND SPADE

Penetrate the Earth When Broad Blade Would Scarcely Make a Mark—Unusually Long-Lived.

Those of us who have ever used a shovel or a spade where the ground was hard know how difficult it is to get a start in digging. Not so if we have one of the shovels or spades invented by a New York man and described by him as "Yankee-toothed." The blades of these tools are made of high-grade steel and along the bottom edge are teeth, about an inch and a half long. These teeth will penetrate the earth when the broad blade would scarcely make a mark, and they do not use up so much of the wielder's strength. The teeth are slightly rounded at the points and are practically self-sharpening. Even after they have worn down, which means after long usage, the workman still has a tool equal to the ordinary type, so these may be considered unusually long-lived.

FRUIT FERTILIZED BY BEES

Colored, Fragrant Petals of Blossom Are Advertising Board Telling Where Honey Is Located.

(By FRANCIS JAEGER, Minnesota Agricultural College.)

If there were no bees, fruit trees and other plants could not produce fruit. Apple, plum, cucumber, clover, alsike, alfalfa are fertilized by bees. Honey is the bait with which the bee is induced to perform this task. The colored, fragrant petals of the blossom are the advertising signboard telling the bee where the honey may be found. If the blossom is to "set fruit," the bee with its fuzzy body must brush some of the yellow dust called pollen from the male organs or antlers of the blossom, and flying away to another blossom, deposit this pollen on the female organ called the stigma. The blossoms are so arranged that to get at the honey the bee must first brush, with its pollen-covered body, against the stigma, thus completing the pollination. As soon as it has performed this duty, it may draw a check for the work in the form of a drop of honey at the bottom of the blossom. While drawing this pay, the bee is involuntarily covered with pollen again and made ready to proceed to the next blossom and repeat the process.

FRAME AS PLANT PROTECTOR

Particularly Adaptable for Use in Cultivation of Peppers, Tomatoes and Other Vegetables.

The Scientific American in describing a plant protector, invented by E. R. Drake of De Land, Fla., says:

This invention is an improvement upon the one for which Mr. Drake received letters patent No. 932,972 particularly adapted for use in the cultivation of plants, peppers, tomatoes, eggplants and other vegetable. The engraving shows a perspective view of a skeleton frame which is rectangular and oblong. The object of using the two boards at the bottom which are on the south side of the frame is to blend the rays of the sun from the time the plants are set out, so as to prevent the rays striking the plants with full force; and the object of the wires is to hold the plants or vines and keep them off the ground. The top of the frame may serve for supporting burlap or other coarse fabric or planks for protecting the plants

PAPA MIGHT HAVE GUESSED

No Doubt He Was Just as Badly Rattled as John Henry Some Two Score Years Ago.

John Henry was keeping company with Myrtle Marie, and when the father of the latter returned from the office one evening he was timidly approached by his pretty daughter.

"Papa," said the fair one, "did John Henry call on you this morning?"

"Yes," answered the paternal one, "but I couldn't make out much of what he said."

"Couldn't make out what he said!" returned Myrtle Marie, wonderingly. "What do you mean?"

"As near as I could understand," explained papa, "he said he wanted to marry me; that you had enough money to support him, and that we had always loved each other, so I told him to go home and write it out in plain English."

After using 5 boxes of Dodds Kidney Pills the swelling disappeared and he felt himself again. He says he has been benefited and blessed by the use of Dodds Kidney Pills. Napoleon's Last Hope Crushed.

One hundred years ago Napoleon, surrounded by a few of his marshals who still remained faithful, was in bitter meditation at Fontainebleau. Apparently he realized for the first time that defection and opposition were getting too strong for him. When he learned that the allies had captured Paris he gave way to the whole fury of his Corsican temperament. But his indomitable spirit was not yet crushed. Despite the discouraging outlook he nourished a faint hope that he might recapture the city and regain his throne. To gain time to work out his plans he sent two of his marshals with an offer to abdicate in favor of his son, the young king of Rome. This offer was rejected without ceremony by the allied sovereigns, who had already agreed upon the restoration of the Bourbons.

One evening he was saying his prayers and omitted his grandmother from the list of those on whom he asked a special blessing. His mother noted the omission and called his attention to it. "Why, Gerald, you forgot to pray for grandma." "Naw I didn't, neither," said Gerald, "but grandma's got'a come across 'fore she gets any more prayers out'a me."—Kansas City Star.

TORTURING TWINGES

Much so-called rheumatism is caused by weakened kidneys. When the kidneys fail to clear the blood of uric acid, the acid forms into crystals like bits of broken glass in the muscles, joints and on the nerve casings. Torturing pains dart through the affected part whenever it is moved. By curing the kidneys, Doan's Kidney Pills have eased thousands of rheumatic cases, lumbago, sciatica, gravel, neuralgia and urinary disorders.

400,000 Settlers a Year

Immigration figures show that the population of Canada increased during 1913, by the addition of 400,000 new settlers from the United States and Europe. Most of these have gone on farms in provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Lord William Percy, an English Nobleman, says:

"The possibilities and opportunities offered by the Canadian West are so infinitely greater than those which exist in England, that it seems absurd to think that people should be impeded from coming to the country where they can most easily and certainly improve their position.

New districts are being opened up, which will make accessable a great number of homesteads in districts especially adapted to mixed farming and grain raising.

Sick Women Attention

Is it possible there is a woman in this country who continues to suffer without giving Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial after all the evidence that is continually being published, which proves beyond contradiction that this grand old medicine has relieved more suffering among women than any other one medicine in the world?

We have published in the newspapers of the United States more genuine testimonial letters than have ever been published in the interest of any other medicine for women—and every year we publish many new testimonials, all genuine and true. Here are three never before published:

From Mrs. S. T. Richmond, Providence, R. I.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.—"For the benefit of women who suffer as I have done I wish to state what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me. I did some heavy lifting and the doctor said it caused a displacement. I have always been weak and I overworked after my baby was born and inflammation set in, then nervous prostration, from which I did not recover until I had taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. The Compound is my best friend and when I hear of a woman with troubles like mine I try to induce her to take your medicine."—Mrs. S. T. RICHMOND, 199 Waldo Street, Providence, R. I.

From Mrs. J. D. Murdoch, Quincy, Mass.

SOUTH QUINCY, MASS.—"The doctor said that I had organic trouble and he doctored me for a long time and I did not get any relief. I saw Lydia E. COMBINED MEXICAN FORCE 83,000 MEN

BOTH FACTIONS HAVE OVERESTIMATED THEIR FIGHTING STRENGTH.

MOBILIZATION IS UNLIKELY

Possibility of Union of Federals and Rebels Against United States Discussed—Things Preventing It.

Washington, April 21.—In the event that the strained relations existing between the United States and Mexico as a result of the Tampico incident and other Huertaist indignities should force the administration to decide ultimately upon a policy of intervention and invasion, what kind of an army or armies would the United States be called upon to face.

Very Pertinent Questions.

What would be the actual strength of the forces the Mexican dictator probably would be able to muster? What of the possibility of the union of Federal and Constitutionalists for the common purpose of repelling the invaders?

These questions, frequently asked and variously answered, have taken on a significance which the present crisis renders important.

Huerta repeatedly has declared that he already has 150,000 men in the field and could easily swell the total to 200,000 within a short time. Villa, the victorious rebel chieftain, on his part, has repeatedly boasted that the constitutionalist forces closely approximated 100,000.

Forces Far Overestimated.

Actual estimates of the United States government, however, reveal the fact that Huerta at present has a uniformed force of not more than 40,000 men, while the combined forces of all the rebel chieftains now operating in the war-cursed republic do not exceed 43,000.

This means that there are in Mexico today approximately 83,000 armed men, almost equally divided between the rebels and the so-called Huerta government.

Just what effect actual invasion of Mexico would have on these figures is largely a matter of conjecture. Authorities, however, agree that the mobilization of Mexico's maximum fighting force would be practically impossible under present conditions.

Impediments to Mobilization.

Transportation facilities, at no time adequate, have been materially crippled through the destruction of railroads and bridges. The movement of troops, consequently, would be seriously handicapped.

It also has been pointed out by men conversant with conditions in the revolt-ridden republic that a large part of the present fighting strength of the forces of all factions in Mexico has been recruited forcibly.

The possibility remains, therefore, that many of these men would secretly, at least, welcome release from enforced military service.

ANNOUNCE REBEL VICTORIES

Three Triumphs in Campaign on Monterey—435 Killed and Wounded in One.

Brownsville, Tex., April 20.—Three rebel victories in the campaign against Monterey are announced at constitutionalists headquarters at Matamoras.

At Cadereyta, 35 miles southeast of Monterey, General Teodoro Elizondo reported that in one engagement his command had routed an entrenched federal force of 2,000, which sustained a loss of 100 killed and 400 wounded and "dispersed."

It was said the constitutionalists lost five officers and 30 soldiers.

CANAL COULD BE UTILIZED

Big Warships of American Navy Might Pass Through Now If Necessary.

Washington, April 20.—If conditions shall call for such action, the Panama canal is now ready to admit and pass through from the Atlantic to the Pacific the largest ships of the Atlantic fleet now on the way to Tampico. This fact was brought out here in comment by government officials who have had charge of important work in connection with the construction of the canal.

More Arrests in Kidnapping.

Denver, Col., April 20.—Two more arrests in connection with the kidnapping of Rev. Otis Spurgeon here on April 5, were made when Michael Burke, an undertaker, and P. A. McLaughlin, a saloonkeeper, were taken by orders of the sheriff. A total of seven arrests has been made.

After the manner of large birds, the apparatus is provided with a spreading tail and two tapering wings, the wings being so placed as to enable it to remain motionless.

ROADS TO LOWER FARES MAY 1

TO CONFORM WITH LONG AND SHORT HAUL LAW.

Only Five Per Cent of Changes Will Show Increases—Rest Decreases.

Washington, April 17. — Readjustment of passenger rates on all interstate railroads in the United States in conformity with the long and short haul provision of the law, under orders of the interstate commerce commission will become effective on May 1. The new tariffs filed by the roads with the commission indicate a material reduction in fares, particularly from important terminals and rate-basing points to intermediate points.

It is estimated by officials of the commission, after an analysis of the tariffs, that "95 per cent of the changes in fares will be reductions," and five per cent increases. Such advances as are made are between terminals or basing points and in such instances the increases are made only when the tariff to intermediate points is so great as to affect seriously the revenues of the roads.

Soon after the enactment of the long and short haul provision, the commission ordered the carriers to readjust their passenger fares in conformity with that principle. At the request of the roads the commission postponed the effective date of its order pending a decision in the Minnesota rate case and in the other cases involving the right of states to fix rates had been handed down by the United States supreme court. Later the supreme court upheld the authority of states to make rates and the commission directed the roads to readjust their passenger fares by May 1.

Except in such instances as the commission may grant permission to the carriers, for well-defined reasons, to exact a higher rate for the shorter than for the longer haul, the roads will be required precisely to conform to the law's provisions.

To what extent the compliance with the orders may affect the revenues of the roads the commission has no means of determining accurately, because that will depend upon the volume of traffic, which is a variable quantity.

Twenty-one years ago, Elwood Haynes built the "horseless carriage"—the little machine that gave birth to the American automobile industry. Ever since then, Haynes cars have been built, year in, year out, without interruption.

And during these twenty-one years, Haynes owners have been demonstrating in "road races," "reliability runs," in "hill climbs" of every description, under all conditions, in this country and abroad with themselves the only "competitors," that the is a good car, and that given ordinary care and attention, the Haynes remains a good car, a mighty good car—indefinitely.

That's why these owners, after years of service, again purchase a Haynes. That's why such a large percentage of the Haynes annual production is sold every season to owners of old Haynes cars. That's why you should investigate the Haynes before you buy any car.

Elwood Haynes was ahead of the times when he built the first Haynes, back in '93. He is ahead of the times now in adopting the greatest automobile refinement in recent years—the Vulcan Electric Gear Shift. This device eliminates the hand-shift lever entirely, and so simplifies the control of the Haynes that anyone may readily drive it. With it, the Haynes is electrically controlled throughout, inasmuch as gear-shifting, starting, lighting and ignition are accomplished by electricity.

FREE GOVERNMENT LAND IN SOUTHERN OREGON

Do you Scandinavian people of the middle west know that the U. S. Government has recently opened 12,000 acres of land in southern Oregon and is now giving it away under the Carey Act and that already over 300 tracts have been taken by the best class of Scandinavians? Consider the fact that you can get from 10 to 160 acres of some of the finest irrigated, fruit and alfalfa land on the Pacific Coast, by paying for only the cost of a perpetual water right, which varies from $23 to $59 per acre, easy terms. THE LAND IS FREE. All the Government requires of you is that you build or have built a small house, cultivate ¼ of the land, fence same and live there seven days. You do not need to even go to the land until the last month of the year 1917. Think of owning a fruit and alfalfa farm in Summer Lake Valley on land ½ mile from the modern town of Paisley, located near thriving farms which have been cultivated for the past 30 years. Think of living in an ideal climate, where the summers are pleasant, the winters mild and where a delightful average exists. If possible plan to join the excursion which leaves Minneapolis, May 5th and May 19th; reduced rates. For information write in Swedish, Norwegian or English to

Was Worth More.

In a newly published book of reminiscences a good story is told of the late Sir William Harcourt. He was about to get into a hansom when a friend passing in a brougham offered to give Sir William, whose avoirdupois was considerable, a lift to his town house.

Sir William accepted the offer and gave the disappointed Jehu a shilling.

"Only a boy, guv'nor," he asked ruefully.

"Certainly," was the reply. "I never got into your cab."

"But, guv'nor," responded the Jehu, "consider the fright you gave the hoss."—Pearson's Weekly.

Are You Suffering From Auto-Intoxication?

The dictionary says that Auto-Intoxication is "poisoning, or the state of being poisoned, from toxic substances produced within the body." This is a condition due to the stomach, bowels, kidneys, liver, or pores of the body failing to throw off the poisons. More than 50% of adults are suffering from this trouble. This is probably why you are suffering from nervousness, headaches, loss of appetite, lack of ambition, and many other symptoms produced by Auto-Intoxication. Your whole system needs stirring up.

DR. PIERCE'S GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY

The Manicure Girl

By
George Randolph Chester

(Copyright by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

"You don't have to ring 'em to tell all the counterfeits," observed the Hotel Belveigh manicure girl as she opened a bundle of emery paper. "Only last week I had one in here that was so rank an imitation you'd think he'd sit up nights to make fun of himself; anyway, you'd begin to understand how Cassie Chadwick took up collections. He was old enough to have fed Methuselah his fennel tea, but the help an old man can get from ugliness, doctors and tailors that ought to have been taxidermists, makes anything they show at the Hippodrome look easy. The minute I caught sight of that saucy little freshman hat and the college-cut clothes, I knew the whole play before the curtain went up, and I wouldn't look in Billy's direction. He was already joshing more than was good for him. You know Billy. He's the boss barber and wants to buy me a plain gold ring and a piano-player, but poor Billy isn't a man of his word. He promised he'd do anything in the world for me, and reneged on the only request I made. He wouldn't change his face.

"Of course, the first thing Mr. Neverdie did when he kittened down into my chair was to squeeze my hand. That was a terrible shock to me. I guess, since it only happens from nine to twenty times a day, and I hardly knew what to do—only just how to stop it. I shifted his hands into and out of the ninety-eight-cent near-cut glass bowl so often he fell to it that the program had been changed without notice, and then he took the number. Billy snickered out loud, and I shot a glare at him that ought to have shrunk him to the size of a one-lunged peanut; but it didn't. He only swelled up and watched for more. He's a regular cut-up, Billy is, and of course he knew there was more coming. These past-due flirty boys get so callous to turndowns that nothing short of a brick makes a dent in them, and He didn't. He was puncture proof, and when he got up to go he leaned over the table to me and said:

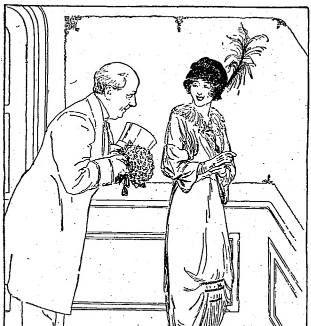
"'What do you think of a nice evening at the theater tonight, and maybe a bird and a bottle after?'

"'Fine!' I chirruped. 'I like to read about it; but if you're hunting some poor but honest working girl of fatal beauty to share it you'd better hurry, for the hour is growing late. For me, not! I'm going to spend this evening with my own grandfather.'

"I hadn't supposed it could be done, but the red began to creep under his make-up, and then I felt a little bit sorry. It's wrong to hit a cripple, anyhow, and as he went out I sunshined at him just so I wouldn't feel like so much of a grouch myself. I thought I could take a chance on that much without putting out the 'Welcome' mat, but say! when I die, put on my tombstone, will you, 'She was a good gy-url, but she couldn't learn.'

"That very evening, as I passed out through the parlors, I saw my Methuselah's uncle, about five years younger in his silk tile and open-faced vest, talking to a real foppy mother and daughter who wore enough happy harness to stock a new Tiffany's. The younger one was such a picture that I swung up close to see if it was hand painted or only a chromo, but that's once I had to send a wireless apology, for her complexion was put on from the inside and would stand scrubbing. She looked perfectly happy except for one thing; all she wanted was something interesting to happen. She was real willing to go right away from there to find it, too, but the other two had their chins on pivots and smiled continuously without pain. 'Anyhow,' I thought, 'Father Time is now back in his own precinct and they'll take care of him if he gets to wandering in his mind.'

"The next morning, bright and early, before I even had my wraps off, pretty soon I saw him watching my hair and my eyes, and I got ready.



"When Uncle Antique Saw Me in This Uniform, I Felt Sorry for His Respectable Family.

"'Do you know,' said he, 'you look exactly like Maxine Elliott?'

"'Of course I know it,' I handed him back. 'Maxine comes in here nearly every day and asks me to quit it, but I won't.'

"That made him pause for the crossing, anyhow, and I got three minutes farther on the way.

"'What a lonesome city this is!' he put in next, and I knew it was no use trying to save him a chill. He wouldn't be satisfied till he got froze stiff.

"'Why did you slip away from him then?' I asked.

"'From—' he began, and then he stopped. He wasn't so slow after all. He'd been going to ask 'from whom,' but he had a flash of second sight and knew I'd hint that it was either his guardian or his keeper.

"'What a cross little dear you are!' he said, and patted my hand.

"'Just see what I have to put up with, though,' I explained, and then I jabbed him one under the thumb nail that set him jumping all over. That jab was for the 'little dear.'

"Wouldn't you think he'd guess his line had been disconnected after that? who should come prancing into the barber shop but my Mr. Sear-and-yellow to have his face ironed, and with a nerve tall enough to make the Singer building look like a hitching post he lifted the roof of his toupee to me and smiled as pleasantly as a mummy that had died dippy. I escaped him when he went out, though, because I was busy with one of the worst kind—a merchant from Darkest Indiana who had come to New York to buy last year's latest style, and who was explaining how much he missed his wife so I would go to the theater with him and let him tell me about her.

"It helped some that afternoon to have a real one drop in. He was a tall, living-picture built young man, and looked so solid he could have had his clothes pressed right on him without hurting. His hands were not a bit pretty; they were better than that; they were good to look at. They were a man's hands, big and strong and brown, but well shaped enough, too; the kind that can hold a high stepper down to an even trot through ten miles of fireworks. It was a nice, firm, warm hand, but it didn't know I held it, and that interested me right away. You know, I suppose I'm like other girls. It makes me mad if they do, and I'm disappointed if they don't. He just sat as quiet as a half dozen raw and looked a hole in my pompadour till Billy hung up the receiver of the telephone and came over to me with:

"'Two-o-two wants you as soon as you can come.'

"I never in my life saw anybody light up the way that young fellow did. All at once he looked like Coney on opening night.

"'Two hundred and two!' he said. 'Go right up to her. Don't mind me. I can wait.'

"I glanced up at him and he looked awfully good to your Aunt Bessie. His face had turned a little bit pink and his eyes had lost that far-away look in a hurry.

"Her! Of course it was a Her in two-o-two! But from the way this young fellow acted I could tell that this was an extra special Her of the very best brand, the choice and pick of the whole Her flock so far as he was concerned.

"'It wouldn't take me but a little bit to get through with you,' I said, keeping my smile for in the elevator.

"'No, I can wait,' he insisted. 'I'd rather wait. To tell you the truth, I want to see you after you come back down,' and he stammered and stuttered like a young married man doing his wife's first shopping with girl clerks. Finally he blurted out: 'Would you mind taking a little note up there for me?'

"'A note!' I said, putting on my toppiest air. 'I don't think the house would permit it. You can call a bell boy from here, and he'll take it up.'

"He fidgeted again, and the more he fidgeted and the redder he got the more I liked him.

"'You see, it's this way,' he explained. 'There's two ladies up there, and I want the younger one to get the note without the older one seeing it.' Then he got so red I began to feel real motherly toward him. He reached in his pocket and pulled out a roll of bills big enough to stuff a Teddy bear.

"'Smother that, young man,' I said. 'Once in a while I like to do a personal favor just to jolly myself along that me heart's in the right place. I tell you what you do. You scratch off your note and give it to me, and I'll think about what I ought to do on the way up. I'll be gone from three-quarters of an hour to an hour. Will you be here?'

"Would he! If I felt as certain of going to heaven as I was that this young man would be right there when I got back, I'd never worry about my conduct as long as I live.

"My! I do love to see a plot thicken, and when I got up to two-o-two you couldn't scratch this one with an installment solitaire; for there was the girl with the complexion that wouldn't come off, and she was prettier in a kimono than she had been in her grand opera stunners! Her mother was there, too, and when I came in they were in a gab-fest up to their pompadours, and blowing and pawing for shore so hard they never noticed me but went right on. Anyhow, you're supposed to wear blinkers and ear cotton around a hotel, so I went dead and got busy. The girl stopped long enough to give me a real human smile as she gave me her nails to do, and then she said:

"'But, mother, just think! Mr. Passay is older than father would have been at this time!'

"'Mr. Passay is young in everything but years,' her mother came back, in that dead level tone of voice the hard-hearted father uses in the Bowery thrillers. 'He is reaping the reward, in his splendid preservation, of a clean, Christian life. He is a gentleman, he is wealthy, and can give you social position. Why, child, he is the leading member of the famous Passay family, first cousin to the Vandercashes, connected by marriage with the Whiteners. He's devoted to you, and all his daughters are grown up and out of the way.'

"Yes, and they'd all take great pleasure in calling me mother!" objected the girl.

"'They wouldn't dare show their faces near yours when they said it,' snapped her mother; 'besides you could stand that for a few years.'

"'That's the trouble,' said the girl. 'He'd never die. He's proved that already. I won't have him, mother, and that settles it!'

"'You're an ungrateful child, Grace!' wailed the mother. 'You'd rather have that young adventurer that I forbade to bother us any more. You have no proper pride at all.'

"'Adventurer!' said Grace, and I liked the way her eyes snapped. 'Mr. Hardy has a fifty-thousand dollar ranch, and a nice little house in a nice little city near by, and money in the bank. And he made it all himself. His social position is good enough for me. It's better than father's was when you married.'

"Well, the old lady began to drip at the eyes right away. Her daughter was ungrateful—again. She had no proper pride—again. She was forgetting a solemn obligation. Her father on his very deathbed had told Grace to mind her mother, and what was she doing now? And the old lady retired to the bath room for first aid to the weepers, scared purple for fear her eyes would show red at lunch.

"By that time your Aunt Bessie had her mind made up good and plenty what to do.

"'This Mr. Hardy,' I guessed, putting a dab of rouge on the prettiest little finger nail I ever saw. 'If he's a young man with two shoulders and several white teeth, I think he's down in the barber shop right this minute, spoiling his finger nails, waiting till I come back. See if his name's on this,' and I slipped her the note.

"Say, she lit up like a Belasco sunrise!

"'I didn't know he was here,' she said, but it wasn't to me she said it, and she just fairly ate that note without salt or pepper.

"'You may tell Mr. Hardy that I cannot write a note just now,' she said, 'but to please send up his card to mother and me right after luncheon. I'll see that he's received.'

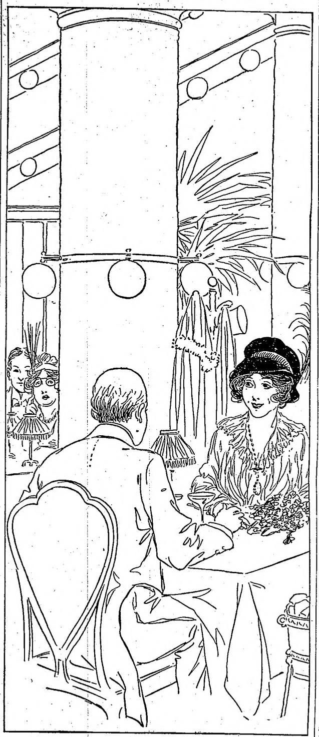
"'You'll win,' I told her. 'I've got a bet on you.'

"When I told Hardy the stunt that was cut out for him he turned the color of his collar and got perfectly limp.

"'Cheer up,' I said. 'The returns are not all in yet, and if there's any way your Aunt Bessie can help stuff the ballot boxes, all her other engagements are off.'

"That night he was waiting to walk out to the car with me, and beaming like a custard pie. He simply had to recite it all to somebody, and I was the only audience he could nail.

"'I saw her,' he said, 'and I'm to see her once more, though I guess that will be about all; at least that's what I was given to understand, and rather plainly. There's no chance for me.'



"I Was Perfectly Wicked and Proud of It."

"'Don't tear up your ticket before the bell rings,' I told him. 'Everything comes out in the wash, for while there's life there's soap. When does this dying interview come off?'

"'Tomorrow night,' he said. 'I'm to take them to the theater.'

"That's when I decided to wedge in. I can't keep out of it. It all comes from my East side bringing up, where, whenever there was a midnight fight, every man in the block yelled out of the window for them to wait till he got his shoes on. If there was anything doing we all wanted to be in it, and I suppose I'll be tickled to death with my own funeral, just because I'll be there and have the best part in the cast. I had a fine plot, standing right where I was, too. I get 'em often that way. Ain't I the little Bessie Bright?

"'Tell you what you do,' I said. 'After the theater you bring your crowd over to Churley's for a bite of supper, and I'll get up a little play for you that'll beat any show on Broadway. Don't get there too quick. Mosey out of the theater slow, and be sure you're the last ones out. Go back to your seat for something to kill more time. When you get into Churley's I'll have a table saved for you. That's all you have to do except sit with your back to me.'

"Of course he was crazy to know what was coming off, but I wouldn't tell him. I wasn't quite sure myself, yet, but the next morning I was, for my passe Mr. Passay waltzes in as usual to have his wrinkles pressed out, and the smile I gave him would have melted this whetstone brick ice cream that they put up for picnics. He was so tickled I thought he'd do a head spin, and by the way Billy frowned I knew I'd done a perfectly scrumptious job on grandpa. After he had his morning face put on, of course he came toddling right over to me, and my, but I was the giddy young thing! It only cost me two glances and another smile to have a theater invitation for that night, and at 5 o'clock I hiked home and put on all my kill'em-deads from the the plumes down.

"When Uncle Antique saw me in the uniform I felt sorry for his respectable family, but I will say he knew how to do the honors, and the way he tucked me into my seat you'd have thought I was the queen of Sheba.

"I enjoyed the show while I was there, too—everything in this world looks so good to me nowadays that I could almost enjoy the toothache—but just before the all-get-busy chorus at the end I got real peevish and made him leave. Of course, the next move was the bird and the bottle, and without letting him know that I was doing the driving I guided him right across to Churley's. The head rusher over there is one of my best trained pets, and as we went inside I dropped behind and spoke to him.

"'Frank,' I ordered, 'get us two tables next to the wall, and when there's a certain party of three comes in—a nice-looking young couple and an old lady—I'll give you the nod and you give them the other table.'

"Frank was on in a minute. We took the far table, and I managed it so grandpa would have his back to the other one. Say! I must be awful slow to learn, for I'd rather have foam than bubbles any day; but this time it was me for the chilly quart. I sipped mine slowly, though, and by touching glasses ever so often I coaxed grandpa on to be the real human sponge. When my special audience came in, the second quart was frosting the silver pail, while grandpa was only twenty-five and getting younger every second. From where I sat I could keep my eye on the door, and as Frank started back with Mr. Hardy and Grace and Ma he caught my nod. I kept grandpa busy just then so that he never turned around, but they saw us. Some they did! The two young ones were wise in a second and the tableau was peaches and cream to them; but mother had the shock of her life, for just as Frank seated her at the end of the table where the whole pantomime was in full view, I had grandpa pawning for my hand, and cackling, plenty loud enough for mother to hear, that I was positively the only original package of genuine joy!

"Of course, mother lorgnetted me for keeps, and if there was a basting thread about me that hadn't been pulled out she saw through to it. If I'd been innocent I'd have shriveled up under that searchlight, but I wasn't. I was perfectly wicked and proud of it, and having the time of my life. So was grandpa. I let him wabble on and on, getting farther and farther away from an alibi all the time, with Mr. Hardy and his Grace all but stuffing napkins into their mouths to keep from screaming. Grandpa got more kittenish every minute. He didn't notice any more whether I was drinking or not, and every glass of the foolish water he took made the lights turn rosier, until at last he got too confectionery and then I arose in offended dignity.

"'Sir,' said I, 'with you at your age I thought I should be sufficiently chaperoned, but as it is I must go home alone! Good evening.'

"I paused just at the end of the other table to say that 'Good evening,' and of course the long-lost old man turned around to look at me. Instead, he found himself looking square into the blazing eyes of mother, and the curtain was down. The last I saw as Frank sent our waiter over to him with the check, was grandpa huddled in his chair, blinking his eyes and trying to figure out what had hit him.

"Maybe they wasn't the grateful ones, young Hardy and his girl. They made me come to the wedding, and mother was quite chocolate creams. She recognized me as the poor, embarrassed girl at Churley's, but not as the manicure girl of the Belveigh, and she seemed quite anxious about my family.

"'Williams?' she repeated, as she shook my hand. 'Williams? Are you by any chance connected with the Williamses of Narragansett?'

"'No; the Williamses of Park Row,' I said, and the dear old soul was perfectly satisfied. She didn't know New York, nor the names on the lamp-posts down Bowery way, and Park Row sounded real aristocratic to her, I guess."

GOOD JOKE ON POLITICIANS

French Senators and Deputies Accepted Invitations to Attend Centenary of Bogus Author.

Life is often stranger than fiction, but that a hoax should be pulled off in cultured and brilliant Paris that surpasses the ingenious fancy of the clerical playwright who wrote the delightful anglo-Irish farce, "General John Regan"—a play in which, thanks to an American joker, a monument is erected in an isolated Irish town to a military and political hero who never existed—is a matter for some surprise. A French newspaper that had doubtless heard of the Irish farce tried the idea on members of the present parliament. It sent a letter to senators and deputies in the name of a "committee" and invited their participation in the grand celebration of the centenary of the "famous author, Hegesippe Simon," a specimen of whose profound and winged phrases was given on the note paper. The striking thought was, "When the sun rises, darkness vanishes." The "committee" offered to furnish material for appropriate addresses in the memory of the great man. This was enough—more than enough.

Fifteen senators and nine deputies—among them ex-cabinet ministers—swallowed the bait. They were so flattered by the invitation that they promptly accepted, omitting to look into works of reference. Some added tributes to the great thinker and regretted contemporary neglect of him. The paper promptly gave away the hoax, and France is laughing at the humiliated politicians. The moral of the affair is too plain to need pointing out. It is safe to say that politicians who hear of the incident will add some biographical literature to their libraries or use more care in the selection of secretaries.

Indian Ghost Story.

Several years ago I had a studio in Albuquerque, N. M., and the walls of my reception rooms and office were hung with large photographs of Indians, Karl Moore writes in Leslie's. One day I was visited by six men of the Navajo tribe, who, after much smoking and visiting, made known the real cause of their call. Directly over my desk was a framed portrait of one of the old medicine men of their tribe who had just died. Believing that a part of his soul was imprisoned in the portrait—else how could it look so like him?—they asked me if I would not destroy it, so that his spirit might be released and be at peace. I immediately took the print from the frame and tore it into bits while the men looked on with silent approval. After thanking me they each shook hands in turn and filed quietly out of the room. They did not suspect that there might still be in existence other copies of the picture or a negative.

Real Drug.

Rutger Jewett, the New York litterateur, gave a luncheon the other day at the Players' club in Germany park and during the game course a club attendant brought to one of Mr. Jewett's literary guests a long, ominous-looking envelope.

At sight of this envelope, so familiar to all litterateurs, a shout of laughter went up.

The object of the laughter blushed, and thrust the envelope hurriedly into his inside coat pocket.

"It's only an elegy, boys," he said, "that the editor of Scribbler's has turned down."

Mr. Jewett shook his head.

"How true it is," he said, "that poetry is on the decline."

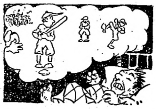
HAPPENINGS IN THE CITIES

Laid Off Duty by a Thrilling Baseball Dream



CHICAGO.—In these days of high-salaried ball players, where the team managers demand speed of their players, some big league magnate is overlooking a promising recruit in not signing John J. Garrigan, second-class detective sergeant at the Central detail police station, to a contract.

Garrigan recently was laid up at his home with a dislocated shoulder as a result of a baseball dream he had, and which came to an abrupt ending when he found himself in the back yard below his bedroom window.

"If Comiskey only had seen that play," Garrigan said, as he nursed his injured shoulder, "I think I could have gotten away with a nice contract with the Sox."

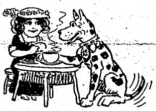
"Funniest thing you ever heard of," said Garrigan. "I dreamed that I was playing with the Sox against the Athletics and that Bender was pitching. It was the ninth inning, with the Macks two runs to the good, when I came to bat. There were two men out and two men on.

"As I stepped to the plate the crowd rose en masse, and for two minutes the cheers were deafening. As I stood there at the plate I remembered the experience of Casey at the bat, and cold chills ran down my back. Then I saw Bender brace himself for the pitch. Over came the ball, and I stood like a goof while the umpire called 'Strike.' The next was a ball, and then came another strike. 'Take him out. Take him out!' they yelled, and as I looked in the direction of the third base I saw Callahan turning handsprings. Then he straightened up and shook his fist at me. I would have been willing to give anything to Bender at that moment if he only had been good enough to let me foul out.

"But no. He wound up, and I closed my eyes and swung. The ball sailed over Oldring's head far into center field, and I began to tear round the bases.

"The game was over. I was sprawling eight feet below my bedroom window with part of the window sash hanging to my anatomy.

Great Dane Honored by New York Society Woman



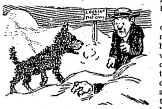
NEW YORK.—It is not a frequent occurrence in the lives of men, famous or otherwise, to have teas given for them by a member of the fair sex. The average man looks upon a tea with horror. It is a thing to be avoided at any cost. There is one member of the masculine sex in this city, however, who not only attends these festivities, but can honestly and truthfully say that he enjoys them.

Natural curiosity makes one wonder who this odd member of the community is. He is Mr. James Galpin, more familiarly known as plain Jim. More curiosity makes one begin to wonder who and what Jim is. Jim is nothing less than a very large and dignified Great Dane, who belongs to Dr. H. T. Galpin.

Is Jim a well-known member of New York society? Indeed he is. He is best known for his great courage and bravery, which has made him a famous character. Dinners and teas, several medals, and a silver bowl have been given him in recognition of his valor.

Recently a large tea was given in his honor by Miss Kate Sanborn. On this occasion he was presented with a silver bowl. This was in appreciation of his bravery in saving the life of his master at a fire in his apartment. He enjoyed every moment of the afternoon.

Incident of Storm Recalls Dog's Persistence



LOOK OUT FOR THE CARS

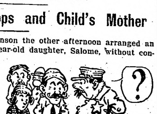
YORK, PA.—Whatever he may lack in pride of ancestry, "Pup," Joseph Klyeman's shaggy little brown dog, has saved a human life. There is many a pedigreed dog that cannot boast as much.

It may be unfortunate that there cannot be recorded a long list of remarkable feats of "Pup" leading up to his crowning achievement; but truth will not permit it. He was simply an ordinary dog, a faithful guardian of the house at night and a companion of his master by day, until the hour arrived for him to work out his destiny. But when that moment came he knew exactly what to do.

On the morning after the great blizzard here recently Klyeman started out to get willows for use in his trade of basket-making. "Pup" accompanied him, as usual. As they approached a Pennsylvania railroad crossing where the white drifts were piled high in the cut, "Pup" suddenly stopped and sniffed, then plunged aside and headlong into a mass of snow. Klyeman paid little attention until the dog ran back to him and leaped about, whining and betraying every evidence of excitement. Then he ran back and began to scratch and burrow in the snow.

Klyeman's curiosity was aroused, and he went to investigate. Buried deep in the snow he found the body of an unconscious man.

Betrothal Party Jars Cops and Child's Mother



DETROIT, MICH.—When Robert Johnson the other afternoon arranged an engagement party for his twelve-year-old daughter, Salome, without consulting his wife, he proved himself, in point of courage, a worthy wearer of the big badge, which adorns his left suspender, and which tells the world that he is assistant chief of all the gipsies of the United States.

Chief Johnson wears no medal for diplomacy, however.

When the chief's chief, Mrs. Lela Johnson, mother of Salome, heard of the affair, she told the police that someone was trying to marry her daughter to a boy of fourteen years. She also told her husband a few things—which, because of postal regulations, shall have no mention here. When Mrs. Johnson returned to her home at 98 Division street, the party was in full swing. Twenty-five members of Chief Johnson's band, dressed in fantastic native garb, were celebrating. The "bridegroom" was not in sight. His father explained that he was in Chicago.

Salome was the belle of the party. Bracelets and necklaces of wrought gold coin adorned her slight figure. Her dress was of a pattern to make Joseph's coat look like a dull monochrome in comparison. The policemen, who responded to Mrs. Johnson's call, addressed Salome's father.

"Surely, you are not going to have this little girl married?" they said.

"Sure I am," said the father. "Five years from now. That's what the party is for."

"Oh!" breathed the enlightened policemen.

QUEEN LOSES THREAD OF CONVERSATION

Queen Mary of England is a poor conversationalist, according to her most recent critics.

On someone being brought up to her it is said she will begin to talk with remarkable felicity, setting the other at ease and delighting him. Then, all of a sudden, she ceases, an acute silence supervenes, and the other does not know whether to break the pause or slip away. The fact is the queen talks well by dint of concentration; this does not always last until the end of the conversation and once the thread is broken she grows abstracted, thinking of something else.

It is suggested that her majesty has adopted the idea, not new to many politicians, of posting herself on a subject that she knows she will be called upon to discuss. Miss Muriel Wilson, one of the most popular girls in society, carried this idea out to perfection, and thereby won the reputation of being one of the most interesting women in England.

Nobody who has not been presented at a court or levee can be asked to meet the king and queen, but the fact they have been presented does not mean that they will be invited to meet their majesties on some other occasion. The presentation at courts or levees has no further results than the appearance of the names of the presented in the following morning's papers.

DANIELS PUTS NAVY ON "WATER WAGON"

Gone forever in the navy are the days of:

"Sixteen men on a dead man's chest.
Yo, ho, and a bottle of rum!"

Secretary Daniels of the navy has prohibited the use of alcoholic liquors within the jurisdiction of the navy department.

The new regulation establishes equality between officers and the enlisted men, as the latter have not been allowed to have a "wine mess" or alcoholic beverages on board ship.

It is expected, following the navy's lead, that the question of abolishing liquor in the army will be revived. Army officers will not discuss the matter in advance of possible action by Secretary of War Garrison.

The navy order was issued the other day, and goes into effect July 1.

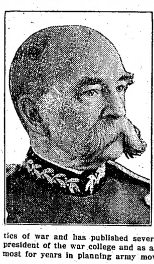
Flogging was abolished in the navy in 1851, and the issuance of grog to the sailors and their right to have liquors on board was abolished in 1861.

The text of Secretary Daniels' order is as follows:

"The use or introduction for drinking purposes of alcoholic liquors on board any naval vessel or within any navy yard or station is strictly prohibited, and commanding officers will be held directly responsible for the enforcement of this order."

The order is based largely on recommendations of Surgeon General W. C. Braisted, who makes the point that there "should not be on shipboard, with reference to intoxicants, one rule for officers and another and different rule for the enlisted personnel."

NEW HEAD OF ARMY'S GENERAL STAFF



Maj. Gen. William W. Wotherspoon, assistant chief of staff of the army, has been selected to succeed Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood as chief of staff at the end of the latter's term, April 22. Brig. Gen. Hugh L. Scott, commanding the troops at Fort Bliss, will be assistant chief of staff. General Wood will assume command of the eastern department. The appointment of General Wotherspoon to be chief of staff was in accordance with the practise of promoting the assistant chief of staff. He will retire on account of age next November. General Scott was superintendent of the Military academy when President Wilson was president of Princeton. He made a favorable impression on the administration by the dispatch and thoroughness with which he settled the recent Navajo uprising in Arizona. Already, however, he was well known to Mr. Wilson. General Wotherspoon is an authority on the theory and tactics of war and has published several valuable pamphlets. In addition, as president of the war college and as assistant chief of staff, he has been foremost for years in planning army movements.

LIKE AVERAGE AMERICAN WOMAN

© HARRIS & EWING

A caller at the Japanese embassy at Washington is ushered by the most correct of butlers into a big drawing room, which, to the smallest detail, is furnished with the conventional elegance of the average American home. Then a diminutive woman, gowned as any American woman of wealth and fashion is gowned, enters and with a cordiality of manner that becomes her well gives the conventional greeting:

"How do you do; I am glad to see you."

The little woman is Viscountess Chinda, wife of the Japanese ambassador to the United States, and one of the most progressive, wide-awake women of the entire diplomatic corps. She has adopted the clothing, the speech and many of the social customs of American women with that ease and efficiency with which the Japanese as a people have assimilated much that is best in occidental civilization. She acquired English a good many years ago, when, from 1889 to 1893, her husband was consul at San Francisco.

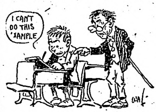
Compulsory Education Regulations and Illiteracy



I CAN'T DO THIS 'XAMPLE

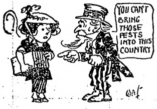
WASHINGTON.—Although six states in the Union are still without compulsory school-attendance laws, and four others have laws that apply only partially, definite progress during the past decade is reported in a bulletin just issued by the United States bureau of education. Since 1905 eight states previously without compulsory laws have adopted them, and it is thought to be a matter of only a few years when compulsory school attendance will be in effect in every state and territory of the United States.

The six states still without compulsory school laws are: South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi and Texas. The four local-option states, where the law is in effect in certain counties only, are Maryland, Virginia, Arkansas and Louisiana.

The bureau's investigation of the subject reveals a close connection between lack of compulsory attendance laws and illiteracy. The states rank in percentage of illiteracy very much in accordance with the length of time compulsory schooling has been in effect and the completeness with which it is enforced.

The states vary widely in number of years and amount of attendance required each year. The period of compulsory attendance is from eight to twelve in North Carolina and Virginia. In most states it is eight to fourteen or fifteen. The present tendency is to raise the upper limit of compulsion. In 17 states the compulsory age limit is sixteen years or above; in Idaho it is eighteen. As a general rule, however, children in all these states are allowed to leave school at fourteen years of age if they secure employment or have completed the eighth grade in school.

Some Visitors Uncle Sam Does Not Want

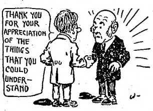


YOU CAN'T BRING THOSE PESTS INTO THIS COUNTRY

THE recent seizure by the New York customs authorities of the village of meadow ants which Mrs. C. W. Morse wished to bring with her from Europe is only an episode in the perpetual war waged against undesirable immigrants, human, animal and vegetable. Mrs. Morse's village, like the one which reached Philadelphia about a fortnight before, was probably a by-product of the increased interest in nature study, but the United States government not only discourages such aids to amateur research but absolutely prohibits them. By a law passed in 1905 the importation of living insects into this country is forbidden and there are other laws which regulate so strictly the importation of larger animals that in many cases no discretion is left to the authorities.

The classic instance of misguided enthusiasm is the introduction in 1869 of the destructive gipsy moth by a scientist named Trouvelot. Trouvelot, a Frenchman by birth, an astronomer in Harvard; unfortunately he was also an ardent entomologist who had devoted much of his leisure time to the consideration of the silk worm industry. In an evil hour he conceived the idea of breeding a hardier worm which might withstand the diseases which then were ravaging rearing establishments in France, and in pursuit of this purpose imported some gipsy moths, intending to cross them with some of the native species found in the United States. It so chanced, however, that he left the window of his study in Medford, Mass., open one day. When he returned a mass of eggs laid by the gipsy visitors had disappeared.

Everything Was All Right Except the Logic



THANK YOU FOR YOUR APPRECIATION OF THE THINGS THAT YOU COULD UNDERSTAND

FORMER Senator Joe Blackburn, now in the city, is bringing to light a lot of forgotten anecdotes of the day when a black slouch hat simply had to be worn by a statesman—otherwise he was no statesman at all. Whenever I look at the coterie of statesmen on the hill nowadays who wear brown derbies, I wonder how far along they would have gone in the old black slouch-hat days.

Anyhow, this lit· story comes from Senator Blackburn.

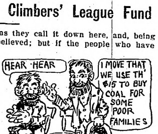
When Charlie Towne of Minnesota was in the senate, serving his 28-day term by appointment, he made a speech. Sort o' short time to get in a speech in the senate, but he did get it in. It was a rip-snorting speech, full of wit and blood and thunder, just the sort of speech that you do not hear every day in the senate. It was a criticism of the Republican policy in the Philippines, and to tell the truth a lot of Republicans were secretly tickled over it, but just didn't dare say so. Among those present was Senator Depew of New York, who just thought to himself he would take a crack at that brand-new 28-day senator. When Towne had closed and his friends were crowding around to congratulate him, up marched Senator Depew.

"A magnificent effort," he said, "a wonderful speech. Your diction was elegant, your delivery forceful, but your logic was execrable."

But Towne was not overpowered by this. He smiled as he returned the compliment.

"Thank you, senator, for your appreciation of the things in my speech which you could understand."

Buy Coal for Poor With Climbers' League Fund



HEAR HEAR
I MOVE THAT WE USE TH' $15 TO BUY COAL FOR SOME POOR FAMILIES

HERE is a story that is "right so," as they call it down here, and, being true, of course, will scarcely be believed; but if the people who have thousand-dollar bills where these derelicts had pennies would follow their lead there would be much less suffering when cold weather comes. It is just the story of one John Parks, who used to be a deckhand on a liner. He came to town last fall and joined the Climbers' league down at the Salvation Army hall in Pennsylvania avenue. The idea of the Climbers' league is to see which member can stay longest on the "water wagon." Each member is employed by the army and each drops a nickel into the league treasury each week. In the spring the league gives a "banquet" with the nickels saved in winter. The nickels accumulate rapidly, as forty or fifty men belong to the league. When the treasurer reported at a meeting recently that the members had saved $15 in nickels prospects of a fancy "banquet" were bright. The "banquet," by the way, marks the end of the winter and the departure of the league members for the highways. But John Parks upset the program at the meeting. He got to figuring on that "women and children first" rule, and he made a speech. The burden of his words was that he didn't think a bunch of "bums" ought to buy a "banquet" when women and children needed food and coal. Parks made a motion that the $15 saved by the league be used to buy three tons of coal. The motion passed unanimously, and as a result Major Evans, in charge of the army, bought the coal and distributed it.

The Mexican Situation

HUERTA ACCEPTS MEDIATION PLANS ASSERTS DIPLOMAT

SPANISH AMBASSADOR BELIEVES MEXICAN DICTATOR HAS ACCEDED TO OVERTURES OF SOUTH AMERICANS.

U. S. OFFICIALS PLEASED WITH PROSPECTS OF PEACE

Little is Known Concerning Plans by Which Neighboring Republics Hope to Bring About Satisfactory Outcome—Military Activities.

Washington, April 28.—Spanish Ambassador Riano announces that he has received private advices from Mexico City stating that General Huerta has accepted the offer of Argentina, Brazil and Chile to use their good offices to bring about an amicable settlement of the difficulty between the United States and Mexico.

Information Considered Authentic.

This information, though unofficial, was accepted as authentic by the ambassador, who expects to be prepared to place General Huerta's formal acceptance before the representatives of the three South American countries immediately.

The interests of the Huerta government in the United States were taken over by the Spanish embassy when Charge Algara asked for his passports and left Washington for Canada.

Received Offer Saturday.

Ambassador Riano received the offer of good offices from the three peace envoys Saturday night, after the offer had been accepted on the part of the United States by President Wilson.

It was cabled at once to the Spanish minister at Mexico City and by him presented to President Huerta.

When the formal acceptance from Mexico City is in hand, the South American diplomats will be ready to proceed with their plan, no intimation of the nature of which has yet been given.

Probable Way of Handling.

It has been generally understood here that the peace envoys expect to deal directly with the situation created by the resentment by the United States government against the Tampico incident and other offenses against its honor and dignity, hoping to bring about a peaceful settlement.

Administration officials appeared to be much gratified at the prospect of having the proposals of the great South Americans listened to by General Huerta.

Until the nature of the plan is known no officer of the administration will have any comment to make.

President Is Hopeful.

President Wilson, hopeful though not confident that war may be averted through the efforts of Argentina, Brazil and Chile, conferred with Secretary Garrison, approving orders for the joint jurisdiction of the army and navy over Vera Cruz and vicinity, Brigadier General Funston, being in command there, having arrived to reenforce Admiral Fletcher's forces of marines and bluejackets.

Tension over the one phase of the situation which may at any moment upset peace plans—the safety of Americans in Mexico City and other interior points—was partially relieved by the announcements of Secretary Bryan that through the British embassy here the Huerta officials and Admiral Fletcher had arranged for the safe departure of Americans from the Mexican capital and the free exodus of Mexicans from Vera Cruz.

British Secretary Aids.

Thomas B. Hohler, first secretary of the British legation in Mexico, taking a train load of Mexicans from Vera Cruz to Mexico City, informed General Huerta that the American forces were in no way restraining Mexicans from leaving there and was assured that Americans consequently would be allowed to leave as they pleased.

Admiral Fletcher's declaration of martial law at Vera Cruz is approved by officials here who realize his difficulties with house-top sharp shooters and concealed enemies.

Arbitrators Confer.

The Brazilian ambassador and the ministers from Chile and Argentina, who have undertaken to solve the Mexican problem by diplomacy, were in conference most of the day.

Secretary Bryan was visited at his home during the day by the peace envoys. After a long conference, Mr. Bryan communicated its nature to the White House.

Reports from the east and west coasts of Mexico from Admirals Badger and Howard, respectively, described energetic efforts, not only of the American navy, but German and British vessels to assist refugees in leaving the trouble-torn republic.

Prepare for Volunteers.

War department officials busied themselves with preparations for a possible call for volunteers under the new volunteer militia law.

While the beginning of peace parleys has not affected the activities of the war and navy departments in planning for any eventualities which may result, yet it has introduced a hopeful feeling into the situation.

Reports Not All Confirmed.

Washington, April 27.—Four Americans reported killed by mobs in Mexico City; American refugees thrown into prison in inland Mexican towns by Huerta's troops and held as hostages; a party of Americans and one British subject so detained reported executed at the order of the dictator; the constitutionalists renewing their attack on Tampico; American forces extending their lines to completely surround the city of Vera Cruz, which they hold. These are the principal developments in the Mexican crisis news.

Not all of these reports have been confirmed officially.

Charge Nelson O'Shaughnessy, when he reached Vera Cruz with his party, declared that a "reign of terror" exists in Mexico City.

Creates Deep Impression.

Galveston, Texas, April 25.—Rush orders to embark for Vera Cruz immediately the Fifth brigade of infantry and as much artillery and cavalry as available in the second division of the army here were received from Washington Thursday night. Early this morning General Funston and his men embarked for Mexico.

The order for the artillery, military men say, created a deep impression, for it is upon this arm of the service that success in a campaign against important inland strongholds generally depends.

VICTORIANO HUERTA

CONGRESS BACKS UP PRESIDENT WILSON

Washington, April 23.—The senate, by a vote of 72 to 13, passed the administration resolution declaring that "the president is justified in the employment of the armed forces of the United States to enforce his demands for unequivocal amends for the affronts and indignities committed against the United States" in Mexico.

House Immediately Concurs.

Without debate and without the formality of a roll call, the house concurred in this resolution. On the viva voce vote the "ayes" were in pronounced majority. A few negative votes were heard here and there on the Republican side when Speaker Clark put the question.

The signed resolution was then sent to the president, thus removing all possibilities of delay.

Missing in Mexico.

Minneapolis. — Frederick J. Splitstone, formerly circulation manager for the Housekeeper Magazine in Minneapolis, has disappeared in Mexico. The state department has been asked to find him. Splitstone is now managing editor for Leslie's Weekly. For two months he has been studying Mexico first hand and has been sending illustrated articles to his paper. F. L. E. Gauss, general manager, said that persistent rumors are to the effect that Splitstone was seized at Torreon.

Consul Shanklin Makes Report.

Washington, April 28.—Consul General Shanklin reported to the state department that he was in actual danger of his life before he finally succeeded in getting out of the Mexican capital to Vera Cruz on the train with Charge O'Shaughnessy. The consul general was one of the first victims of the military censors and was not permitted to communicate to the department. In his report he said there were exciting moments in Mexico during the day preceding his departure.

REPORTED INSULTS INCENSE PRESIDENT

HUERTA FOLLOWERS BURN U. S. FLAGS AND IMPRISON CONSUL-GENERAL.

OFFICIAL REPORT IS RECEIVED

Phillip C. Hanna Wires Secretary Bryan of the Indignities Suffered at Monterey by Order of Federal Officers—Freed by Rebels.

Washington, April 28. — President Wilson and Secretary Bryan were greatly incensed upon receiving a dispatch from Consul-General Phillip C. Hanna at Monterey, Mexico, announcing that he had been subjected to insults and indignities by Mexican federal officers there and kept a prisoner in the government palace from April 22 until the Constitutionalist forces captured the town two days later.

Flags Are Burned.

The consul reported that mobs led by federal officials tore down all the American flags in the city, trampled upon them and burned them up in the streets.

Upon the arrival of the Constitutionalists Mr. Hanna was released and treated with mared consideration. He said the rebel officers made speeches in front of the state house giving assurances of full protection to all foreigners and non-combatants.

Long Conference Follows.

Secretary Bryan went to the White House and had a long conference with the president when the consul-general's report reached the state department.

Mr. Hanna's message to Secretary Bryan was dispatched from Monterey.

The telegram follows, in part: "On the twenty-first of April a Federal military officer by the name of Captain Alvarez Del Castillo, evidently instructed by the Federal military commander to tear down all American flags, arrived at this consulate-general with a street mob which he had gathered, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, pounded on the door and demanded that the American flag over this consulate-general be immediately lowered or he would shoot it down, and the other Federals proceeded to tear down all American flags, standing on them, making speeches throughout the city of Monterey, burning some of them, and tearing them up and leaving them piled in the middle of the streets.

Most Insulting Act.

"It was the most insultig act that any of the people of Monterey have ever witnessed. They then placed a police guard in front of this consulate-general and all the inmates in this building were considered prisoners. The next morning, the twenty-second of April, about 10 o'clock, a police lieutenant arrived with a force of men and advised me that he had been instructed to search the building. The insulting search was completed about noon, when your consul-general was taken, prisoner, through the streets with the mob and carried first, to the penitentiary, and afterwards to the state government palace, which building has been for some time military headquarters and fortified, and was subject of special attack by the then attacking forces.

Insulted Because of Position.

"While I was placed under heavy guard in the grand reception room of the state palace, I fully realized that I was constantly being considerably insulted and greatly humiliated, not on account of my personality, but on account of my official position as representative of the United States government in Northern Mexico.

"At about 8 o'clock in the evening of April 22, I was taken before the military court and notified that I was charged with being in sympathy with the constitutionalist chiefs and as being friendly to certain constitutionalist generals, and especially General Pablo Gonzales and General Antonic Villareal.

"I was kept a prisoner until the evacuation of the city by the federal forces and until the arrival of the Constitutional forces. There were times during the period when it was believed by many that I would be shot or carried to the mountains as their prisoner in case the federals evacuated."

American Dies in Rome.

Rome, April 27.—Very Rev. Joseph Amrhein, assistant general of the Passionist congregation, died here. He was an American.

Ulsterites Get 70,000 Rifles.

Belfast, Ireland, April 27. — Completely outwitting the authorities, the unionists of Ulster successfully carried out the greatest "gun-running" in the history of Ireland and landed 70,000 rifles which have been distributed throughout Ulster. Five million rounds of ammunition were landed at Larne. With this war material at hand, the Ulster leaders declared they were now ready to resist to the limit the enforcement of home rule. Thirty thousand aided in the distribution.

VILLA WANTS TO PRESERVE PEACE WITH AMERICA

THINKS IT FINE FOR REBELS THAT UNITED STATES HAS TAKEN VERA CRUZ—ASSAILS HUERTA.

MUST FOLLOW CARRANZA, HOWEVER, AS A SOLDIER

Constitutionalist General Doesn't Know Intent of Chief in Sending Message—Belief Expressed It Was Misinterpreted.

El Paso, Tex., April 25.—With El Paso on a war footing, with machine guns guarding the international bridges, field pieces trained upon the Mexican side, and practically all the troops at Fort Bliss on duty in the city, Pancho Villa, has sent a message of peace.

"I do not wish war with the United States. Mexico has trouble enough of its own without taking up a war with another nation," said Villa at his headquarters in Juarez.

"I am here for the purpose of seeing some of my good American friends and I believe the result will be even more friendly relations with the United States than now exist. I shall do all in my power to avert any trouble between the two nations."

Villa denies that his entire army is coming to the border, or that he has any idea of making an attack on El Paso.

British Citizens Warned.

In El Paso, H. C. Myles, British consul, carrying out the orders of his government, warned British citizens to get out of Mexico. The battalion of infantry which has been guarding the city was reinforced by another battalion of the Twentieth, a squadron of the Twelfth cavalry, Battery C of the Sixth artillery and a machine gun platoon. Colonel Hatfield established headquarters in the City hall, on the roof of which a military wireless tower was erected and telephone wires were strung by the signal corps to enable him to communicate promptly with his subordinates in the field.

The black muzzles of field guns, parked in the camp of the reinforcements in the Texas & Pacific railroad reservation in East El Paso, are ready to pour their shells into a foreign foe should one appear.

Many Arm Selves.

At the hardware and gun stores purchasers of weapons stood in line as if waiting at a box office for tickets at some popular show. They were Americans, for the edict went forth that none would be sold to Mexicans without a permit from Sheriff Peyton Edwards.

General Villa was a disappointment. He was supposed to be bringing a personal escort of 200 men, but to avoid provocative appearances the general left most of them behind at Chihuahua and appeared only with 25 or 30 of his followers. He remarked:

Calls Huerta "Drunken Ass."

"What does the United States want to pay any attention to that old drunken ass, Huerta, for, anyway?"

Villa himself is a teetotaler. The hero of Torreon said he came on private business affairs and to see Mrs. Villa. With Villa were Generals Urbina, Angeles and Rodriguez.

"Why," he smiled, as he threw an arm about the broad shoulders of the government representative, "all Europe would laugh at us if we went to war with you. They would say that 'Little drunkard Huerta has drawn them into a tangle at last.'"

Not Consulted by Carranza.

Villa said that he was not consulted in the drafting of the Carranza note transmitted to Secretary Bryan and which was regarded as somewhat hostile in tone.

"Honest," said the Rebel general, "I hope the Americans bottle up Vera Cruz so tight they can't even get water into it. Your admiral is doing something it would have taken us a long time to accomplish, if we could have accomplished it at all."

Roberto V. Pesqueira, Carranza's confidential agent here, insisted that the note of his chief to Secretary Bryan was not hostile, but was intended as a basis for further negotiations. He was expecting a reply from Mr. Bryan setting forth the views of the state department.

Will Follow Carranza's Orders.

When Villa was asked whether he would join forces with Huerta in war against the United States, he said:

"As I have already stated, such an event is improbable; but to answer your question, I must state that I am a soldier and am ready to follow all orders of my chief, General Carranza."

More Troops Sent to Border.

Washington, April 25.—Three regiments of infantry at San Francisco and the artillery at Fort Riley, Kan., have been ordered to report to Brigadier General Bliss for service along the Mexican border. The brigade ordered to report to General Bliss from the San Francisco Presidio will consist of the Sixth, Twelfth and Sixteenth regiments of infantry, comprising in all approximately 2,500 men. The Sixth field artillery, from Fort Riley, was designated to move to the border.

Wood to Have Charge of Army In Event of War

Although Major General William W. Witherspoon, Wednesday, assumed his duties as chief of staff of the army, succeeding Major General Leonard Wood, General Wood has been selected to be commander in chief of the army in the event that it is sent into Mexico.

MORE KILLED IN STRIKE WAR

WILSON LIKELY TO SEND FEDERAL TROOPS.

Truce is Broken and Fighting is Resumed by the Strikers—Dynamiting Done.

Pueblo, Colo., April 28.—Three men employes of the steel mill in this city were shot Sunday by alleged strikers near here. They were members of a party of 20 men on their way to Williamsburg in an automobile.

Will Send Troops.

Washington. — President Wilson probably will send federal troops into Colorado to aid in composing the serious situation in the coal fields.

Colorado representatives in congress after conference at the White House, said they expected the troops to be ordered out in the morning.

Governor Ammons' telegraphic request for troops had been considered in conferences during the day. Last night, Senator Thomas went to the White House with telegrams from friends in Denver, telling him that the "situation is getting more urgent every minute." He urged that assistance from the federal government at once was imperative.

The senator had another telegram from Governor Ammons saying that both sides were bringing reinforcements and arms and ammunition into the state. The militia has made no move, the governor said, since the truce was declared; but "nearly all day Saturday and all of Sunday violence on the part of the strikers has continued."

Dynamite is Used.

Denver, Colo.—Strikers dynamited and fired the Chandler coal camp of the Victor American Fuel company in Fremont county, according to reports to the governor's office, which declared seven men had been killed in the battle.

The few guards and the residents of the camp, numbering 25 to 30, went to Canon City.

Overwhelmed by a force of strikers at the Royal Gorge mine, the handful of mine guards, with Manager E. C. Bettis and all the women and children of Royal Gorge, fled to Canon City. Mr. Bettis said that so far as he could learn the strikers had not occupied the abandoned property.

General Chase was ordered to Canon City with 200 militia to bring about a truce.

State officials, including Governor Ammons, declared the truce which had continued for two days between the strikers in the southern coal fields and the state militia had been broken by the strikers and that the militia now is under no obligation to refrain from aggressive acts to restore peace.

Mexican Charge Wires Thanks.

Washington, April 27.—Secretary Bryan received a telegram from Senor Algara, the Mexican charge d'Affaires now in Canada, thanking the secretary of state for the courtesies extended him in connection with his departure.

War Seen in Movement.

Calexica, Cal., April 27.—"The coming of American troops in such numbers to Calexica can have but one meaning—war," Colonel Juan Lajero, commander of the Mexican Federal garrison at Mexicali, said. The statement was made at a meeting attended by him, Captain Arthur Poillon, commanding the United States cavalry here, and Colonel W. G. Schreiber, commanding the battalion of the Seventh regiment, California National guard, which arrived here

FEDERALS DESTROY TOWN ON BORDER

FEDERALS ENGAGE IN WILD ORGY OF DESTRUCTION AT NUEVO LAREDO.

U. S. TROOPS ROUT RIOTERS

Two Mexicans Killed in Battle That Ensues.—Dynamite and Fire Destroy All Important Places Including U. S. Bldg.

Laredo, Tex., April 27. — Nuevo Laredo, the thriving Mexican border town opposite here, is in ruins, devastated by dynamite and fire by Mexican federal soldiers, who late Friday began an orgy of destruction which did not end until they were forced to flee southward before the guns of the American border patrol.

Two Mexicans Killed.

Two Mexicans are known to have been killed by the United States troops and several were seen to fall when United States soldiers from Fort McIntosh got into action. Several brisk skirmishes between the Americans and Mexicans were fought in quick succession as the Mexicans, their troop trains ready to pull out of the burning city, began an indiscriminate fire across the international boundary, but there is no evidence that their shooting had been effective.

U. S. Consulate Destroyed.

Property damage in Nuevo Laredo will reach $500,000. Among the buildings destroyed were the United States consulate, municipal building, postoffice, theater, the flour mill, one of the largest in this section of the southwest, the railroad shops of the Mexican National railway and other smaller structures.

About everything inflammable had been wiped out. Kerosene and other combustibles, liberally used, added to the wreckage, which otherwise would not have been great, owing to the adobe construction largely used.

No Property Loss in U. S.

There was no property loss in Laredo. Both international bridges are safe, though efforts to dynamite them resulted in the death of two men engaged in the undertaking. One Mexican was shot by a sharpshooter from the top of the water tower. The Mexican was trying to reach the end of the international foot and wagon bridge. Another was killed when he was trying to blow up the American railroad bridge. Americans were constantly at the American side to prevent such an attempt.

When the Mexican soldiers finally departed order was quickly restored in Laredo, but strong guards remain throughout the city.

A Serious Problem.

A serious problem was furnished immigration and city authorities by the presence here of hundreds of refugees from the burning city who had to be furnished food and shelter.

The federal garrison evacuated Nuevo Laredo Thursday, supposedly going to Saltillo or Monterey. With their departure the busy little city, ordinarily of about 7,000 population, was deserted all who did not follow the soldiers rushing panic-stricken to the American side in fear of bandit attacks. Early Friday the Federals returned and it was announced that they came back for additional engines to pull their troop trains. The Mexican railroad shops are here.

Fire Follows Explosions.

There was little excitement occasioned by the presence of the Federals until the afternoon. Smoke was seen issuing from some of the buildings around the plaza, the center of the town. Then began the brief reign of terror.

1,954 REFUGEES COMING HOME

So Far as is Known All Americans Out of Tampico—Rebels Bombarding.

Washington, April 27.—In a dispatch from Vera Cruz, Admiral Badger reports the following from Admiral Mayo at Tampico:

"The Patterson and Pauling have arrived at Tuxpan. The Esperanio sailed for Galveston, with 140 Vera Cruz refugees and 220 Tampico refugees. The Dixie sailed for Galveston with 575 refugees. The Connecticut sailed for Galveston with 419 refugees. The total number of refugees, including other ships not mentioned, sent to Galveston is 1,954.

"So far as is known all Americans are out of the district around Tampico.

"The Constitutionalist attack on Tampico is in progress. Gunboats are firing."

All Tampico Refugees Home.

Galveston, Texas, April 27.—The battleship Connecticut and torpedo boat convoy Dixie came into port Sunday bringing the last of the American refugees from Tampico and nearby districts. "There may be five or six Americans still in Tampico, but they would not leave," said Captain John J. Knapp of Connecticut just after the battleship had dropped anchor. There were 490 refugees on the Connecticut and 570 on the Dixie. In all, about 2,100 American refugees have landed.

MINNESOTA, PLAYGROUND OF THE NATION

By CHARLES W. HENKE,
Secretary of the Minnesota Game and Fish Commission.

It is human nature to look with covetous eyes at unattainable things. In doing so, how much do we miss that is close at hand? Who has not longed for a trip to the Maine woods, the trout streams of Colorado, the mountains, the seashore or the "sunny South?" The nearness of things may obstruct our vision but to others these very things by "distance lend enchantment."

George J. Bradley, President Game and Fish Commission.

Because we cannot sail down the magic Rhine, need we ignore the majestic scenery of our own state? If we cannot fish for tarpon at our Gulf resorts have we not plenty of excitement with the finny in domestic waters? If we cannot camp in the Rockies or the Adirondacks, have we not millions of acres and miles of shore, right at home that furnish the most ideal camping spots of the world? Why sigh for the game trails of Africa when there is deer to be had in 1,000 townships of Minnesota, and moose in 600 more? Why are people coming to this state by the thousands every year to share the delights of our boundless recreation grounds unless "Minnesota makes good?"

Trophies of the Chase in Northern Minnesota.

A Sportsmen's Resort.

Minnesota has many years been the nation's most extensive and popular resort for the sportsmen. The advantages and resources that are presented to the lovers of outdoor life, the knights of the rod and reel, and the followers of Diana are most alluring. The state contains millions of acres covered with forest and stream that offer every inducement to the vacationist. Camping, hunting, fishing and canoeing necessarily take us out into the open where the tired brain is relieved of the monotony of the daily grind, and in the peacefulness of nature we absorb some of that refreshing bigness that gives us a clearer perspective of the absorbing life back home. Minnesota's opportunities for the enjoyment of invigorating outdoor life are of immeasurable value to the state in the matter of public health.

E. W. Cobb, Superintendent of Fisheries.

The latest government report announces that Minnesota is the healthiest state in the union, and little doubt can exist that a potent influence resulting in this much to be desired distinction is the fact that our state contains such boundless opportunities for outdoor recreation. And all of these delightful pastimes may be pursued in a setting of prodigal beauty. The silent forests, the magnificent lakes, the leisurely rivers, the hurrying rapids, the grotesque rock foundation, and over all, a sky as blue as any sky can be—it is all yours to enjoy, and truly you can sing,

I love thy rock and rills,
Thy woods and templed hills.

To Keep Poet Busy.

There is enough material within the borders of our state to keep poets busy for a generation to come and a Corot for a life-time. Who has not heard of Hiawatha or Minnehaha Falls? What a mighty inspiration our natural beauties might be to one who

In the love of nature holds
Communion with her invisible forms.

How many people less fortunately situated think nothing of going fifty miles to reach a lake? It would seem as though there were not an inhabitant of Minnesota who is long out of the sight and sound of a lake or river or stream. Thousands of them teeming with perch, bass, trout, pike, pickerel, sturgeon, muscallonge—a paradise for the angler. On the shores of these lakes hundreds of splendidly equipped summer resorts can be found for the care and comfort of the vacationist, tourist and sportsman. The railroads all publish beautifully illustrated pamphlets each spring giving detailed information in regard to these, and explaining the most convenient method by which they can be reached. In many instances an hour's ride from the great centers of population will bring one into the heart of the best fishing and hunting grounds. The convenience and minimum of expense with which the vacationist can find a location to suit his tastes and desires is a mighty factor in the popularity of our recreation resorts. The army of tourists to Minnesota's hunting and fishing resorts increases every year and many can be found journeying half way across the continent to enjoy a few days afield with dog and gun or at the lakes with rod and reel.

The Game of Minnesota.

In the timbered sections, partridge, quail and ruffled grouse abound. In the larger open areas one finds the prairie chicken, while the swamps and lakes abound with waterfowl of all species during the migratory seasons. The vacationist who prefers to spend his allotted period of freedom in the exciting search for "big game" has an astonishing surprise in store for him if he has never paid a visit to the "Big Woods." Over one-half of the area of the state is inhabited by deer, and moose are found in satisfactory numbers. The glorious panorama that nature spreads before the entranced beholder in these unspoiled fastnesses beggars description and causes the most glowing accounts of widely heralded scenic wonders to pale into insignificance. The most seasoned guides or the oldest inhabitants of this section never fails to grow eloquent when telling of the wonders of the northern part of the state.

The Creator's plan for beautiful, plenteous and happy surroundings for man is evident in the lavishness with which they are bestowed upon this region. But what would this rich heritage have profited us if we, as a state, did not realize the responsibility that accompanies it? This supply of wild game that makes our state so attractive to the tired worker, quickens his wits, affords physical exercise, brings him close to nature, was handed down to us to use economically, to supply our needs and then be passed on to posterity.

Coming to Camp After a Day's Hunt.

Conservation a Necessity.

Minnesota early learned the necessity for the conservation of this priceless boon and the intelligent legislation and wise administration of a system of game laws in years gone by has restrained the slaughter that has depleted in many sections of the country, a most valuable asset. Is not the passing of the buffalo a familiar story to us all? Are we going to allow shortsighted legislation to deprive us of the means to carry on the fundamental work of wild game and fish conservation? The license fees are paid by the sportsmen with the idea and the general supposition that the funds thus derived are utilized for the protection and propagation of game and fish and presaging for many years to come the fine fishing and hunting grounds that are now so numerous and valuable. This is not true of Minnesota at the present time as an act of the legislature deprived the state department of these revenues and has resulted in seriously crippling the cause of conservation by a measure and insufficient appropriation in its stead.

It is fortunate that the state has capable and efficient business men at the head of the state department who are enthusiastic sportsmen themselves and in full sympathy with the spirit of game and fish conservation and who have given their untiring and unselfish efforts to furnishing of every means to secure the increase and perpetuation of the wild life of our state. These men have served without pay and their enthusiasm, in co-operation with the fine spirit of the many gun clubs in the state, is creating a tremendous public sentiment that will soon make the "game hog" and the poacher as extinct as the dodo.

Game Laws Improving.

It is true that our game laws leave much to be desired, but these are gradually being improved, as experience teaches wisdom and new conditions arise. But the enforcement of the laws we have is a prime necessity and it is of the utmost importance that individuals and organizations exert themselves to insure their more effective enforcement by preventing any unwise act of legislation that may tend to curtail the efficiency of the state department and unite in a concerted movement that will spread the sentiment of conservation in this most important feature of our state attractions and resources.

Material Side Also.

Vacation and recreation is not altogether a matter of pleasure. It also has its material side, which make the question of preserving the wild life that abounds in the state a serious one. Deer hunting and fishing must be regarded as a matter of business as well as of pleasure.

Minnesota's fish and game is worth millions to its inhabitants as food and sustenance for thousands who seek a foothold in the now uninhabited portions of the state. To illustrate, we quote the following from the biennial report of 1907:

"The material value of Minnesota's native game, fish and fur bearing animals is tremendous and constitutes one of her greatest natural resources. The number and area of her inland lakes and streams exceed those of any other state. Her forest area suited to big game is vast in extent. The possibilities presented in a material sense by these unrivaled attractions may be at least imagined when it is considered that the state of Maine, with much less area, fewer lakes and streams and no more alluring attractions, realizes an annual income of $15,000,000 from expenditures of nonresident hunting and fishing tourists."

In No Fear of the Hunter.

Minnesota's splendid work in keeping up and increasing the population of our lakes, woods and streams, should never be allowed to cease. With the material benefits to be derived and the health giving opportunities for outdoor life that abound in such abandon, the matter of expense dwindles to such an extent that it is not to be considered.

Minnesota is proud of her position in the country as a vacation state. She unselfishly labors to perpetrate that good name and the present generation looks forward to the time when it will leave the rich and bountiful blessings that it has enjoyed during its life to the generations that are to come, with the hope that the good work is still to flourish and increase in the future as it is now.

STAMP IS VALUED AT $10,000

One Issued in British Guiana Known to Collectors as the Rarest in the World.

Pride of place among the many valuable and unique specimens belongs to a singularly unpretentious and sorry looking stamp issued in the colony of British Guiana in 1856, for provisional use pending the arrival of a fresh consignment of the regular postage stamps from England, writes D. B. Armstrong in the Strand. It is of the denomination one cent, the design being crudely set up from ordinary printer's type at the office of the Official Gazette, with the central device of a sailing ship taken from the heading to the shipping announcements in the paper.

The single known copy of this rarity was discovered by a young collector in the colony among some old family papers stored away in an attic. Knowing nothing of its scarcity and not being favorably impressed by its appearance, he sold it to another collector for a trifling sum, the purchaser also being ignorant of his great bargain. Ultimately it found its way to Europe and now reposes in the collection of M. Philippe de la Renotiere of Paris, the distinguished owner of the world's greatest stamp collection, who purchased it many years ago for an amount that has never been disclosed, but it is believed to have been at that period a record one. Its intrinsic value today, in the very unlikely contingency of its ever coming into the market, is certainly in excess of ten thousand dollars.

A report on this famous stamp by a celebrated expert states that "the copy is a poor one, dark magenta in color, and somewhat rubbed. It is initialed 'E. D. W.' and dated April 1, the year not being distinct enough to be read." Nevertheless, it is the rarest stamp in the world.

The United States exported 82,000,000 gallons of gasoline in the fiscal year ending with June.

In a public statement Mr. Lee declared that he was for the primary when Governor Eberhart was working for its defeat in 1911, and that he is for it just the same today. Then he asks why Governor Eberhart does not urge county option as a measure directly in line with the principle of the direct primaries.

Hastings.—Robert Devon and Edward Gilbert, colored, charged with larceny of brass bearings from the Rock Island road at Inver Grove, were arraigned in the district court yesterday, the former being sentenced by Judge Albert Johnson to a suspended sentence of six months during good behavior, and the latter to thirty days in jail.

Winona.—The Winona district convention of the women's home and foreign missionary societies of the Methodist Episcopal church at Chatfield continued through Thursday and Friday.

The farmers met in the market town, and there was a calculating look in the eyes of both as they faced each other. "About that there coo I was talking to you of the other day," began Farmer Dobbins, "will you take twelve pounds for her, George?" "No, no. Oi couldn't part with 'er for that—not by a long chalk." "But t'other day you told me you might let 'er go for that." "Something's 'appened to the coo since then." "Mercy on us, George, what's the matter? Coo dead?" "Worser 'n that," said George. "You see, my old missus can't abear to part with t' old coo. It 'ud break 'er 'eart. She'd sob 'erself into a fit over it." "Well, well. I suppose that ends the business?" ECZEMA ON BACK AND CHEST

Pierson, N. Dakota.—"The eczema started on my scalp. It finally went on to the back of my neck, then on to my back, arms and chest. It broke out in pimples first and then seemed to run together in some places, making a sore about the size of a dime. At times the itching and burning were so intense that it seemed unbearable. The more I scratched it the worse it became, and there would be a slight discharge from it, especially on my scalp, so as to make my hair matted and sticky close to the scalp. The hair was dry, lifeless and thin. My hair was falling so terribly that I had begun to despair of ever finding relief. My clothing irritated the eruption on my back. The affected parts were almost a solid scab.

"I had been bothered with eczema for about a year and a half. Then I began using the Cuticura Soap and Ointment. I used them daily for two months and I was cured." (Signed) Miss Mildred Dennis, Apr. 30, 1913.

Plea for the Hen.

I should like to see the hen on a plane, at least, with the turkey and the goose.

She is their superior in every way except that of size, and yet they have long held the place of honor on the Christmas and the Thanksgiving dinner table, and they have had reams and reams of poetry written about them.

But the hen, that most important of all feathered creatures, who writes poetry about her? Who even takes the trouble to know anything about her early history in America? Who owned the first hen; when and where did she land upon our shores?

Why not make amends for our long years of neglect by making her the center of the feast on the Fourth of July? Hereafter let it be our Thanksgiving turkey, our Christmas goose, and our Fourth of July hen.—Atlantic.

Pettit's Eye Salve MAKES SORE EYES WELL

THE SUNBEAM,

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3,1879

The Democrats are in the same kind of a primary election fight as the Republicans, as Lawler refused to be eliminated until the June Primary, when he will be put out of the race proper.

By the time Lee and Eberhart get through roasting each other, from now until the June primaries, the people will come to the conclusion that neither one of them is a fit man for governor of Minnesota.

Clearwater County has produced two candidates for representative, and Pennington County has two candidates for State Senator, while Red Lake County has only one candidate for Representative which had ought to make the one from Red Lake quite sure of being one of the chosen ones to represent the district.

Judge Wm. Watts, one of the judges in this judicial district, has been endorsed by the Polk county bar as a candidate for Judge of the state supreme court. He has been judge in this district for twenty years. In case he becomes a candidate two Crookston lawyers are mentioned as his successor, viz: A. A. Miller and W. E. Rowe. It is very likely that Norman county would also present a candidate in either Peter Sharpe or Peter Matson. —Norman County Index.

M. A. Brattland, of Ada, is to be the candidate of the Socialist party for Congressman from this district in opposition to Halvor Steenerson. It is to be hoped that him and his friends profited by their experience two years ago, and will not start a mud throwing campaign. They laughed at their own mud slinging until their opponents replied, then they got mad, and got badly "did." Of course the people of this district would not elect a man to congress at this time, who would want to supplant the stars and stripes on the battle ships blockading the Mexican coast with the red flag of brotherly love.

The continual changes of country publishers, is detrimental to all publishers of country newspapers, Eastern advertisers are careful not to make contracts with country newspapers for fear that they will have two or three new publishers to deal with before the year is out. Particulary is this true of newspapers that put in a plant in a small village, under the promise of liberal advertising by business men. After the paper is establish-ed and gets out their first issue the interest of the business men begins to wane, for they have got what they want a newspaper. The poor country editor goes to work and gets out his weekly paper, publishing the local news and booming the town and territory, and in about three months when he presents his advertising bill, a number of the business men will throw down the cash as if they were handing him a donation and say, "Well I guess you can take that add out, as it don't do me any good." They have got what they wanted, a newspaper, and there is no use for them to pay out another cent. In about three months more the poor misguided editor finds that he is not able to meet his grocery and butcher bills, and they begin to call him a "dead beat." Then he begins to go down hill until he finally has to sell out, give away and get out.

Our rate is $5.00 for a short political announcement. If you want to tell the people what you have been doing and expect to do in the future, 5 cents a line will be the rate to the June Primaries.

Political Announcement

Inserted by C. L. Hanson and paid for by him at regular advertising rates.

Having been urgently requested by many friends to become a candidate for the State Senate, I have decided to comply with their requests, and offer myself for that important position.

I respectfully solicit the support of the voters of Clearwater, Red Lake and Pennington Counties, at the primary election to be held June 16th, 1814, and if nominated and elected, I pledge my best efforts to the honest and efficient service of the people of my District and State.

I hereby submit my platform for your consideration and approval

I advocate and if elected will support:

Legislation for greater state aid for roads and bridges.

Legislative provision for development of state lands by the state.

Any legislation that will help compel proper business-like economy and increase the efficiency of administration of the State's business affairs.

Equal suffrage for woman.

The enactment of laws that will do away with the spoils system in all departments of state, and the placing of all state departments under civil service rules.

Corporations, in my opinion, should be regulated so as to insure to the public the best possible service in every instance, and should be permitted reasonable returns only, for service rendered.

I am unalterably opposed to "Boss Rules" in politics.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the people in State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of conditions in the rural communities.

Yours very truly,

THE LOCAL NEWS

Get ready for springs work.

The campaign for the primaries is now on tap.

There is to be a basket party at the Erie Hall to morrow night.

Get guaranteed clover and timothy seed at Ellingsons.

E. A. Mostue is having a deep well dug on his farm this week.

Inquire of Ellingson for timothy and clover seed.

Local news are rather scarce this week.

Fine sunshiny weather to day and the farmers are rushing the seed into the ground.

We publish in another column the platform of Oscar Stenvick, of Bagley, candidate for Representative from this District.

The artical entitled "Minnesota the play ground of the nation" published on another page should be read by all our readers.

Ellingson has a lot of guaranteed timothy and clover seed, which they are selling at reasonable prices.

Gundet Stromme, the Oklee cattle buyer was around this week picking up a car load of cattle for the St. Paul market.

Abel Bost bought a team of LaCount this week and will put in the Henry Bost farm this season.

Theodore H. Liden of Thief River Falls has announced himself as a candidate for County Treasurer, as will be seen in another column. This will make a lively scrap for the county treasurer's office.

The rain storm Monday night has again delayed seeding for another week, and as the season is getting late for wheat, it is beginning to worry the farmers, but there is no use to fret about it for you know northern Minnesota always produces a crop.

We occasionally get a political announcement with a request to publish and that the party will be out to see us later. It is not necessary to come up to see us in order to pay the $5.00 publication fee, as you can send it by mail, and if some of the candidates notice that their announcement does not appear in our columns, remit the publication fee, and they will see there announcement appear the next issue.

HORSES! HORSES! HORSES!

Just arrived with two car loads of native broke mares, ready to go to work at once. These mares weigh from 1400 to 1600 pounds. Don't miss this chance to get big bargains. Come at once.

One useless expense that the next legislature wants to relieve the tax payers of this district from, is that fire warden business. It might be all right to have fire wardens in the cutover pine districts east of here, but they are a useless expense in this part of the country. Our present fire warden draws $2.50 a day from the tax payers, and puts in his time attending to his store at Kratka. Of course we don't blame him for getting a pension from the state, but there is getting to be so many of them kind of fellows, that it is time for the tax payers to kick.

Panama Canal Lighthouses.

It is announced that a feature of the Panama canal will be lighthouses whose lamps are lit and extinguished by the sun, without the aid of human hands. Briefly, the warmth of the sun at dawn, falling on a rod which rests on a lever, expands that rod and so moves the lever which closes the gas valve. At night the rod, getting cooler, contracts and so opens the valve and lets the gas pass, to be lit by a small jet always left burning. The rod can be adjusted according to the temperature conditions of any country. The sun valve is the invention of Gustaf Dalen, the famous Swedish physicist, recently awarded a Nobel prize.—Illustrated London News.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

To the Voters of the new 65th District, composed of the Counties of Pennington, Clearwater and Red-Lake:

I hereby announce myself as a candidate for Representative for the said district. I solicit your support and votes at the primaries to be held June 16th, 1914.

I have been a resident of the District for the past thirty-two years and have I believe, grown to know the wants and needs of the citizens of the district, and as political platforms have been eliminated by the Non-Partisan Election Law, I therefore hold it to be the duty of all persons seeking legislative honors to declare themselves upon public questions affecting the welfare, health and morals of the people of the State.

If nominated and elected, I pledge myself to use my best efforts and ability to work for the following legislation:

Legislation for economy and efficiency in State Administration of business affairs for the purpose of lightening the burden of the present high taxes.

I favor putting the telephones of the state under the supervision of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission and compelling physical connection of lines and regulation of rates.

I shall encourage the adoption of the Revolving Fund Amendment, known as House File No. 1242. Also the Initiative Referendum Amendment.

Equal suffrage for women.

I favor the sale of foreign bonds held by the State of Minnesota, and the investment of the permanent funds of the State in improving our own state, instead of loaning them to other states at a low rate of interest. The money should be used to finance our Counties, Cities, Drainage, Projects, School Districts and Loans on Resident Farm Property.

I favor the increase in the royalties paid the State when the present mineral leases expire.

I favor Consolidation and Reduction of the State Board Commissions in the interests of economy.

I favor the submission of the liquor question to the vote of the people, to the end that communities where they are of the opinion that right living and higher morals may be attained by the elimination of liquor, may at least have an opportunity of putting their views to the test.

I also favor liberal allowances for advertising the resources of the State with a view of reducing immigration.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of the condition in the rural communities.

Hoping you will give my platform due consideration and favor me with your franchise, I am most

Respectfully,
JOHN A. DUFFY.

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in a road house near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city and identifies the body. A young woman who accompanied Wrandall to the inn and subsequently disappeared, is suspected. Wrandall, it appears, had led a gay life and neglected his wife. Mrs. Wrandall starts back for New York in an auto during a blinding snow storm. On the way she meets a young woman in the road who proves to be the woman who killed Wrandall. Feeling that the girl had done her a service in ridding her of the man who though she loved him deeply, had caused her great sorrow. Mrs. Wrandall determines to shield her and takes her to her own home. Mrs. Wrandall hears the story of Hetty Castleton's life, except that portion that relates to Wrandall. This and the story of the tragedy she forbids the girl ever to tell. She offers Hetty a home, friendship and security from peril on account of the tragedy. Mrs. Sara Wrandall and Hetty attend the funeral of Challis Wrandall at the home of his parents.

CHAPTER IV.—Continued.

Beside Sara Wrandall, on the small, pink divan, sat a stranger in this somber company: a young woman in black, whose pale face was uncovered, and whose lashes were lifted so rarely that one could not know of the deep, real pain that lay behind them, in her Irish blue eyes.

She had arrived at the house an hour or two before the time set for the ceremony, in company with the widow. True to her resolution, the widow of Challis Wrandall had remained away from the home of his people until the last hour. She had been consulted, to be sure, in regard to the final arrangements, but the meetings had taken place in her own apartment, many blocks distant from the house in lower Fifth avenue. The afternoon before she had received Redmond Wrandall and Leslie, his son. She had not sent for them. They came perfunctorily and not through any sense of obligation. These two at least knew that sympathy was not what she wanted, but peace. Twice during the two trying days, Leslie had come to see her, Vivian telephoned.

On the occasion of his first visit, Leslie had met the guest in the house. The second time he called, he made it a point to ask Sara all about her.

It was he who gently closed the door after the two women when, on the morning of the funeral, they entered the dark, flower-laden room in which stood the casket containing the body of his brother. He left them alone together in that room for half an hour or more, and it was he who went forward to meet them when they came forth. Sara leaned on his arm as she ascended the stairs to the room where the others were waiting. The ashen-faced girl followed.

Mrs. Wrandall, the elder, kissed Sara and drew her down beside her on the couch. To her own surprise, as well as that of the others, Sara broke down and wept bitterly. After all, she was sorry for Challis' mother. It was the human instinct, she could not hold out against it. And the older woman put away the ancient grudge she held against this mortal enemy and dissolved into tears of real compassion.

A little later she whispered brokenly in Sara's ear: "My dear, my dear, this has brought us together. I hope you will learn to love me."

Sara caught her breath, but uttered no word. She looked into her mother-in-law's eyes, and smiled through her tears. The Wrandalls, looking on in amaze, saw the smile reflected in the face of the older woman. Then it was that Vivian crossed quickly and put her arms about the shoulders of her sister-in-law. The white flag on both sides.

Hetty Castleton stood alone and wavering, just inside the door. No stranger situation could be imagined than the one in which this unfortunate girl found herself at the present moment. She was virtually in the hands of those who would destroy her; she was in the house of those who most deeply were affected by her act on that fatal night. Among them all she stood, facing them, listening to the moans and sobs, and yet her limbs did not give way beneath her. . . .

Some one gently touched her arm. It was Leslie. She shrank back, a fearful look in her eyes. In the semi-darkness he failed to note the expression.

"Won't you sit here?" he asked, indicating the little pink divan against the wall. "Forgive me for letting you stand so long."

She looked about her, the wild light still in her eyes. She was like a rat in a trap.

Her lips parted, but the word of thanks did not come forth. A strange, inarticulate sound, almost a gasp, came instead. Pallid as a ghost, she dropped limply to the divan, and dug her fingers into the satiny seat. As if fascinated, she stared over the black heads of the three women immediately in front of her at the full-length portrait hanging where the light from the hall fell upon it: the portrait of a dashing youth in riding togs.

A moment later Sara Wrandall came over and sat beside her. The girl shivered as with a mighty chill when the warm hand of her friend fell upon hers and enveloped it in a firm clasp.

"His mother kissed me," whispered Sara. "Did you see?"

The girl could not reply. She could only stare at the open door. A small, hatchet-faced man had come up from below and was nodding his head to Leslie Wrandall—a man with short side whiskers, and a sepulchral look in his eyes. Then, having received a sign from Leslie, he tiptoed away. Almost instantly the voices of people singing softly came from some distant remote part of the house.

And then, a little later, the perfectly modulated voice of a man in prayer.

Back of her, Wrandalls; beside her, Wrandalls; beneath her, friends of the Wrandalls; outside, the rabble, those who would join with these black, raven-like specters in tearing her to pieces if they but knew!

The droning voice came up from below, each well-chosen word distinct and clear: tribute beautiful to the irreproachable character of the deceased. Leslie watched the face of the girl, curiously fascinated by the set, emotionless features, and yet without a conscious interest in her. He was dully sensible to the fact that she was beautiful, uncommonly beautiful. It did not occur to him to feel that she was out of place among them, that she belonged down stairs. Somehow she was a part of the surroundings, like the specter at the feast.

If he could have witnessed all that transpired while Sara was in the room below with her guest—her companion, as he had come to regard her without having in fact been told as much—he would have been lost in a maze of the most overwhelming emotions.

To go back: The door had barely closed behind the two women when Hetty's trembling knees gave way beneath her. With a low moan of horror, she slipped to the floor, covering her face with her hands.

Sara knelt beside her.

"Come," she said gently, but firmly; "I must exact this much of you. If we are to go on together, as we have planned, you must stand beside me at his bier. Together we must look upon him for the last time. You must see him as I saw him up there in the country. I had my cruel blow that night. It is your turn now. I will not blame you for what you did. But if you expect me to go on believing that you did a brave thing that night, you must convince me that you are not a coward now. It is the only test I shall put you to. Come; I know it is hard, I know it is terrible, but it is the true test of your ability to go through with it to the end. I shall know then that you have the courage to face anything that may come up."

She waited a long time, her hand on the girl's shoulder. At last Hetty arose.

"You are right," she said hoarsely. "I should not be afraid."

Later on they sat over against the wall beyond the casket, into which they had peered with widely varying emotions. Sara had said:

"You know that I loved him."

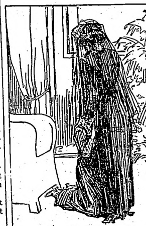
The girl put her hands to her eyes and bowed her head.

"Oh, how can you be so merciful to me?"

"Because he was not," said Sara, white-lipped. Hetty glanced at the half-averted face with queer, indescribable expression in her eyes.

If Leslie Wrandall could have looked in upon them at that moment, or at any time during the half an hour that followed, he would have known who was the slayer of his brother, but it is doubtful if he could have had the heart to denounce her to the world.

When they were ready to leave the room Hetty had regained control of her nerves to a most surprising extent, a condition unmistakably due to the influence of the older woman.



Hetty's Trembling Knees Gave Way Beneath Her.

"I can trust myself now, Mrs. Wrandall," said Hetty steadily as they hesitated for an instant before turning the knob of the door.

"Then I shall ask you to open the door," said Sara, drawing back.

Without a word or a look, Hetty opened the door and permitted the other to pass out before her. Then she followed, closing it gently, even deliberately, but not without a swift glance over her shoulder into the depths of the room they were leaving.

Of the two, Sara Wrandall was the paler as they went up the broad staircase with Leslie.

The funeral oration by the Rev. Dr. Maltby dragged on. Among all his hearers there was but one who believed the things he said of Challis Wrandall, and she was one of two persons who, so they saying goes, are the last to find a man out; his mother and his sister. But in this instance the mother was alone. The silent, attentive guests on the lower floor listened in grim approval: Dr. Maltby was doing himself proud. Not one but all of them knew that Maltby knew. And yet how soothing he was.

* * * * * * *

By the end of the week the murder of Challis Wrandall was forgotten by all save the police. The inquest was over, the law was baffled, the city was serenely waiting for its next sensation. No one cared.

Leslie Wrandall went down to the steamer to see his sister-in-law off for Europe.

"Goodby, Miss Castleton," he said, as he shook the hand of the slim young Englishwoman at parting. "Take good care of Sara. She needs a friend, a good friend, now. Keep her over there until she has—forgotten."

CHAPTER V.

Discussing a Sister-in-Law.

"You remember my sister-in-law, don't you, Brandy?" was the question that Leslie Wrandall put to a friend one afternoon, as they sat drearily in a window of one of the fashionable uptown clubs, a little more than a year after the events described in the foregoing chapters. Drearily, I have said, for the reason that it was Sunday, and raining at that.

"I met Mrs. Wrandall a few years ago in Rome," said his companion, renewing interest in a conversation that had died some time before of its own exhaustion. "She's most attractive. I saw her but once. I think it was at somebody's fete."

"She's returning to New York the end of the month," said Leslie. "Been abroad for over a year. She had a villa at Nice this winter."

"I remember her quite well. I was of an age then to be particularly sensitive to female loveliness. If I'd been staying on in Rome, I should have screwed up the courage, I'm sure, to have asked her to sit for me."

Brandon Booth was of an old Philadelphia family: an old and wealthy family. Both views considered, he was qualified to walk hand in glove with the fastidious Wrandalls. Leslie's mother was charmed with him because she was also the mother of Vivian. The fact that he went in for portrait painting and seemed averse to subsisting on the generosity of his father, preferring to live by his talent, in no way operated against him, so far as Mrs. Wrandall was concerned. That was his lookout, not hers; if he elected to that sort of thing, all well and good. He could afford to be eccentric; there remained, in the perspective he scorned, the bulk of a huge fortune to offset whatever idiosyncrasies he might choose to cultivate. Some day, in spite of himself, she contended serenely, he would be very, very rich. What could be more desirable than fame, family and fortune all heaped together and thrust upon one exceedingly interesting and handsome young man?

He had been the pupil of celebrated draftsmen and painters in Europe, and had exhibited a sincerity of purpose that was surprising, all things considered. The mere fact that he was not obliged to paint in order to obtain a living was sufficient cause for wonder among the artists he met and studied with or under.

His studio in New York was not a fashionable resting place. It was a workshop. You could have tea there, of course, and you were sure to meet people you knew and liked, but it was quite as much of a workshop as any you could mention. He was not a dabbler in art, not a mere dauber of pigments: he was an artist.

Booth was thirty—perhaps a year or two older; tall, dark and good looking. The air of the thoroughbred marked him. He did not affect loose, flowing cravats and baggy trousers, nor was he careless about his finger-nails. He was simply the ordinary, every-day sort of chap you would meet in Fifth avenue during parade hours, and you would take a second look at him because of his face and manner but not on account of his dress. Some of his ancestors came over ahead of the Mayflower, but he did not gloat.

Leslie Wrandall was his closest friend and harshest critic. It didn't really matter to Booth what Leslie said of his paintings: he quite understood that he didn't know anything about them.

"When does Mrs. Wrandall return?" asked the painter, after a long period of silence spent in contemplation of the gleaming pavement beyond the club's window.

"That's queer," said Leslie, looking up. "I was thinking of Sara myself. She sails next week. I've had a letter asking me to open her house in the country. Her place is about two miles from father's. It hasn't been opened in two years. Her father built it fifteen or twenty years ago, and left it to her when he died. She and Challis spent several summers there."

"Vivian took me through it one afternoon last summer."

"It must have been quite as much of a novelty to her as it was to you, old chap," said Leslie gloomily.

"What do you mean?"

"Vivian's a bit of a snob. She never liked the place because old man Gooch built it out of worsteds. She never went there."

"But the old man's been dead for years."

"That doesn't matter. The fact is, Vivian didn't quite take to Sara until after—well, until after Challis died. We're dreadful snobs, Brandy, the whole lot of us. Sara was quite good enough for a much better man than my brother. She really couldn't help the worsteds, you know. I'm very fond of her, and always have been. We're pals. 'Gad, it was a fearful slap at the home folks when Challis justified Sara by getting snuffed out the way he did."

Booth made an attempt to change the subject, but Wrandall got back to it.

"Since then we've all been exceedingly sweet on Sara. Not because we want to be, mind you, but because we're afraid she'll marry some chap who wouldn't be acceptable to us."

"I should consider that a very neat way out of it," said Booth coldly.

"Not at all. You see, Challis was fond of Sara, in spite of everything. He left a will and under it she came in for all he had. As that includes a third interest in our extremely refined and irreproachable business, it would be a deuce of a trick on us if she married one of the common people and set him up amongst us, willy-nilly. We don't want strange bedfellows. We're too snug—and I might say, too smug. Down in her heart mother is saying to herself it would be just like Sara to get even with us by doing just that sort of a trick. Of course Sara is rich enough without accepting a sou under the will, but she's a canny person. She hasn't handed it back to us on a silver platter, with thanks; still, on the other hand, she refuses to meddle. She makes us feel pretty small. She won't sell out to us. She just sits tight. That's what gets under the skin with mother."

"I wouldn't say that, Les, if I were in your place."

"It is a rather priggish thing to say, isn't it?"

"Rather."

"You see, I'm the only one who really took sides with Sara. I forget myself sometimes. She was such a brick, all those years."

Booth was silent for a moment, noting the reflective look in his companion's eyes.

"I suppose the police haven't given up the hope that sooner or later the—er—the woman will do something to give herself away," said he.

"They don't take any stock in my theory that she made way with herself the same night. I was talking with the chief yesterday. He says that anyone who had wit to cover up her tracks as she did, is not the kind to make way with herself. Perhaps he's right. It sounds reasonable. 'Gad, I felt sorry for the poor girl they had up last spring. She went through the third degree, if ever anyone did, but, by Jove, she came out of it all right. The Ashtley girl, you remember. I've dreamed about that girl, Brandy, and what they put her through. It's a sort of nightmare to me, even when I'm awake. Oh, they've questioned others as well, but she was the only one to have the screws twisted in just that way."

"Where is she now?"

"She's comfortable enough now. When I wrote to Sara about what she'd been through, she settled a neat bit of money on her, and she'll never want for anything. She's out west somewhere, with her mother and sisters. I tell you, Sara's a wonder. She's got a heart of gold."

"I look forward to meeting her, old man."

"I was with her for a few weeks this winter. In Nice, you know. Vivian stayed on for a week, but mother had to get to the baths. 'Gad, I believe she hated to go. Sara's got a most adorable girl staying with her. A daughter of Colonel Castleton, and she's connected in some way with the Murgatroyds—old Lord Murgatroyd, you know. I think her mother was a niece of the old boy. Anyhow, mother and Vivian have taken a great fancy to her. That's proof of the pudding."

"I think Vivian mentioned a companion of some sort."

"You wouldn't exactly call her a companion," said Leslie. "She's got money to burn, I take it. Quite keeps up with Sara in making it fly, and that's saying a good deal for her resources. I think it's a pose on her part, this calling herself a companion. An English joke, eh? As a matter of fact, she's an old friend of Sara's and my brother's too. Knew them in England. Most delightful girl. Oh, I say, old man, she's the one for you to paint." Leslie waxed enthusiastic. "A type, a positive type. Never saw such eyes in all my life. Dammit, they haunt you. You dream about 'em."

"You seem to be hard hit," said Booth indifferently. He was watching the man in the "slicker" through moody eyes.

"Oh, nothing like that," disclaimed Leslie with unnecessary promptness. "But if I were given to that sort of thing, I'd be bowled over in a minute. Positively adorable face. If I thought you had it in you to paint a thing as it really is I'd commission you myself to do a miniature for me, just to have it around where I could pick it up when I liked and hold it between my hands, just as I've often wanted to hold the real thing."

* * * * * * *

Sara Wrandall returned to New York at the end of the month, and Leslie met her at the dock, as he did on an occasion fourteen months earlier. Then she came in on a fierce gale from the wintry Atlantic; this time the air was soft and balmy and sweet with the kindness of spring. It was May and the sea was blue, the land was green.

Again she went to the small, exclusive hotel near the park. Her apartment was closed, the butler and his wife and all of their hastily recruited company being in the country, awaiting her arrival from town. Leslie attended to everything. He lent his resourceful man servant and his motor to his lovely sister-in-law, and saw to it that his mother and Vivian sent flowers to the ship. Redmond Wrandall called at the hotel immediately after banking hours, kissed his daughter-in-law, and delivered an ultimatum second-hand from the power at home: she was to come to dinner and bring Miss Castleton. A little quiet family dinner, you know, because they were all in mourning, he said in conclusion, vaguely realizing all the while that it really wasn't necessary to supply the information, but, for the life of him, unable to think of anything else to say under the circumstances. Somehow it seemed to him that while Sara was in black she was not in mourning in the same sense that the rest of them were. It seemed only right to acquaint her with the conditions in his household. And he knew that he deserved the scowl that Leslie bestowed upon him.

Sara accepted, much to his surprise and gratification. He had been rather dubious about it. It would not have surprised him in the least if she had declined the invitation, feeling, as he did, that he had in a way come to her with a white flag or an olive branch or whatever it is that a combative force utilizes when it wants to surrender in the cause of humanity.

As soon as they were alone Hetty turned to her friend.

"Oh, Sara, can't you go without me? Tell them that I am ill—suddenly ill. I—I don't think it right or honorable of me to accept—"

Sara shook her head, and the words died on the girl's lips.

"You must play the game, Hetty."

"It's—very hard," murmured the other, her face very white and bleak.

"I know, my dear," said Sara gently.

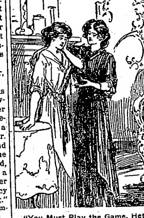
"If they should ever find out," gasped the girl, suddenly giving way to the dread that had been lying dormant all these months.

"They will never know the truth unless you choose to enlighten them," said Sara, putting her arm about the girl's shoulders and drawing her close.

"You never cease to be wonderful, Sara—so very wonderful," cried the girl, with a look of worship in her eyes.

Sara regarded her in silence for a moment, reflecting. Then, with a swift rush of tears to her eyes, she cried fiercely:

"You must never, never tell me all that happened, Hetty! You must not speak it with your own lips."



"You Must Play the Game, Hetty."

Hetty's eyes grew dark with pain and wonder.

"That is the thing I can't understand in you, Sara," she said slowly.

"We must not speak of it!"

Hetty's bosom heaved. "Speak of it!" she cried, absolute agony in her voice. "Have I not kept it locked in my heart since that awful day—"

"Hush!"

"I shall go mad if I cannot talk with you about—"

"No, no! It is the forbidden subject! I know all that I should know—all that I care to know. We have not said so much as this in months—in ages, it seems. Let sleeping dogs lie. We are better off, my dear. I could not touch your lips again."

"I—I can't bear the thought of that!"

"Kiss me now, Hetty."

"I could die for you, Sara," cried Hetty, as she impulsively obeyed the command.

"I mean that you shall live for me," said Sara, smiling through her tears. "How silly of me to cry. It must be the room we are in. These are the same rooms, dear, that you came to on the night we met. Ah, how old I feel!"

"Old? You say that to me? I am ages and ages older than you," cried Hetty, the color coming back to her soft cheeks.

"You are twenty-three."

"And you are twenty-eight."

Sara had a far-away look in her eyes. "About your size and figure," said she, and Hetty did not comprehend.

CHAPTER VI.

Southlook.

Sara Wrandall's house in the country stood on a wooded knoll overlooking the sound. It was rather remotely located, so far as neighbors were concerned. Her father, Sebastian Gooch, shrewdly foresaw the day when land in this particular section of the suburban world would return dollars for pennies, and wisely bought thousands of acres: woodland, meadowland, beachland and hills, inserted between the environs of New York city and the rich towns up the coast. Years afterward he built a commodious summer home on the choicest point that his property afforded, named it Southlook, and transformed that particular part of his wilderness into a millionaire's paradise, where he could dawdle and putter to his heart's content, where he could spend his time and his money with a prodigality that came so late in life to him that he made waste of both in his haste to live down a rather parsimonious past.

Two miles and a half away, in the heart of a scattered colony of purse-proud New Yorkers, was the country home of the Wrandalls, an imposing place and older by far than Southlook. It had descended from well-worn and time-stained ancestors to Redmond Wrandall, and, with others of its kind, looked with no little scorn upon the modern, mushroom structures that sprouted from the seeds of trade. There was no friendship between the old and the new. Each had recourse to a bitter contempt for the other, though consolation was small in comparison.

It was in the wooded by-ways of this despised domain that Challis Wrandall and Sara, the earthly daughter of Midas, met and loved and defied all things supernal, for matches are made in heaven. Their marriage did not open the gates of Nineveh. Sebastian Gooch's paradise was more completely ostracised than it was before the disaster. The Wrandalls spoke of it as a disaster.

Clearly the old merchant was not over-pleased with his daughter's choice, a conclusion permanently established by the alteration he made in his will a year or two after the marriage. True, he left the vast estate to his beloved daughter Sara, but he fastened a stout string to it, and with this string her hands were tied. It must have occurred to him that Challis was a profligate in more ways than one, for he deliberately stipulated in his will that Sara was not to sell a foot of the ground until a period of twenty years had elapsed. A very polite way, it would seem, of making his investment safe in the face of considerable odds.

He lived long enough after the making of his will, I am happy to relate, to find that he had made no mistake. As he preceded his son-in-law into the great beyond by a scant three years, it readily may be seen that he wrought too well by far. Seventeen unnecessary years of proscription remained, and he had not intended them for Sara alone. He was not afraid of Sara, but for her.

When the will was read and the condition revealed, Challis Wrandall took it in perfect good humor. He had the grace to proclaim in the bosom of his father's family that the old gentleman was a father-in-law to be proud of. "A canny old boy," he had announced with his most engaging smile, quite free from rancor or resentment. Challis was well acquainted with himself.

And so the acres were strapped together snugly and firmly, without so much as a town lot protruding.

So impressed was Challis by the far-sightedness of his father-in-law that he forthwith sat him down and made a will of his own. He would not have it said that Sara's father did a whit better by her than he would do. He left everything he possessed to his wife, but put no string to it, blandly implying that all danger would be past when she came into possession. There was a sort of grim humor in the way he managed to present himself to view as the real and ready source of peril.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Its Moral Advantage.

"There is going to be a great moral reform in side to this freak fashion of wearing pink and purple hair."

"What's that?"

"A woman won't have to lie about its being all her own."

Quarreling before marriage may be an indication of love, but it does not indicate the same after the ceremony.

WOMAN COULD NOT SIT UP

Now Does Her Own Work. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Helped Her.

Ironton, Ohio.—"I am enjoying better health now than I have for twelve years. When I began to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound I could not sit up. I had female troubles and was very nervous. I used the remedies a year and I can do my work and for the last eight months I have worked for other women, too. I cannot praise Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound enough for I know I never would have been as well if I had not taken it and I recommend it to suffering women."

Daughter Helped Also.

"I gave it to my daughter when she was thirteen years old. She was in school and was a nervous wreck, and could not sleep nights. Now she looks so healthy that even the doctor speaks of it. You can publish this letter if you like."—Mrs. RENA BOWMAN, 161 S. 10th Street, Ironton, Ohio.

Why will women continue to suffer day in and day out and drag out a sickly, half-hearted existence, missing three-fourths of the joy of living, when they can find health in Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound?

If you have the slightest doubt that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will help you, write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass., for advice. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

1913 RECORD Magnificent Crops in all Western Canada

All parts of the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, have produced wonderful yields of Wheat, Oats, Barley and Flax. Wheat graded from Contract to No. 1 Hard, weighed heavy and yielded from 20 to 45 bushels per acre; 22 bushels was about the total average. Mixed Farming may be considered fully as profitable an industry as grain raising. The excellent grasses full of nutrition, are the only food required either for beef or dairy purposes. In 1912, and again in 1913, at Chicago, Manitoba carried off the Championship for beef steer. Good schools, markets convenient, climate excellent. For the homesteader, the man who wishes to farm extensively, or the investor, Canada offers the biggest opportunity of any place on the continent.

Country Owes Much to Men Who Safeguarded the Vast Commerce of the Nation.

A lightship must keep always in one particular place. Anchored to the bottom of the sea, she has her steam always up, but she never sails unless relieved by another ship so that she may put into port for repairs. And such a boat is used because a warning must be given at a place where it is impossible to build a lighthouse, and where even the clamor of a gigantic bell buoy is not sufficient to warn the navigator. No matter how fiercely the storm beats or how desperate may be the boats' plight, she must stay at her moorings. The only movement she is allowed to make under the regulations is to sink when at last she can withstand the gale no longer. It would bring them deserved recognition if the government ever published a list of those who have lost their lives in the line of such perilous duty. For about $6,000,000 a year these men and their craft save from disaster the billions of dollars' worth of shipping and commerce that come to American shores.—The Popular Magazine.

NOT SO MUCH TO BE PITIED

Visiting Englishmen Wasted Sympathy on Man of Millions Who Was Out for Exercise.

James Stillman once received a group of British financiers in his imposing New York office and entertained them at luncheon in the Metropolitan club. Afterward he excused himself, saying that he had important business. "But you can use my big French motor," he said, pointing to a splendid $15,000 machine that stood outside. They accepted his invitation and started off.

A few hours later the Britons were speeding down a hill on the Hudson river drive. Suddenly they spied a lone cyclist toiling up the incline. He was pumping hard, but making progress. As they neared him one of the Britishers said:

"I wonder who that begger is?"

"Poor devil!" remarked another.

When they raced past him they saw that the poor devil was their host, the head of one of the greatest of world banks, in whose costly car they were riding.—Saturday Evening Post.

Aged Should Eat Sparingly.

A British scientist lays down a regimen of hygiene for the treatment of the aged. It is pointed out that the aged require less food of all kinds, because they utilize less. Overfeeding, or rather a normal adult's ration, overtaxes their digestive powers and floods the blood with effete products which the kidneys and other emunctories cannot handle. Drinking water should be encouraged, and baths, which should be taken regularly, should be neither hot nor cold, of short duration, and preferably in the evening, when they conduce to a good night's sleep. Fresh air and exercise are indispensable. Clothing should be light, warm, loose and of woolen material. The feet should be well protected.

GRAPHIC STORY OF VERA CRUZ

Capture of Mexican City After Two Days' Fight Presents Vivid Picture.

VALOR OF OUR BLUEJACKETS

Warships Shelled Buildings in Which Mexican "Snipers" Had Taken Refuge—Natives Surprised at Courtesy of American Troops.

Vera Cruz, Mexico, April 24.—Twelve Americans were killed and thirty wounded before the city of Vera Cruz came into the undisputed possession of the American invading forces after a two-day fight. Although the Mexicans suffered more severely, the number of their casualties has not been ascertained. The best estimates obtained by Capt. William R. Rush of the battleship Florida indicated that in the engagements of Tuesday and Wednesday their dead numbered about one hundred and fifty. No person knows how many Mexicans fell wounded, as many of them were taken away and hidden by friends.

In the streets about the plaza Wednesday afternoon lay fifteen or twenty bodies, a majority of them attired in citizen's clothing. Some of the men evidently had been dead since the engagement Tuesday and the tropical heat made their immediate disposal imperative. One of the first orders given after the town had been captured was to bury the Mexican dead in a trench at the sea end of one of the streets leading from the plaza.

Scores Are Taken Prisoners.

When the city was taken the order was given to advance carefully and search every building for men bearing arms. Scores of prisoners were taken, the majority of them protesting volubly—many hysterically—that they were not guilty of any unfriendliness toward the Americans. Accustomed as the Mexicans are to seeing their own contending forces shoot immediately all prisoners taken, the captured men could not but believe that they would receive no less drastic treatment at the hands of the Americans. The guns found in houses were thrown by the marines and bluejackets from the upper balconies to the pavement below.

The most spirited action was the taking of the naval academy. Aside from that fight, no definite, organized opposition was encountered by the Americans. A hot fire was poured from the naval college, but a few well directed shots from the cruisers Chester, San Francisco and Prairie tore gaping holes in the stone walls and silenced the rifle fire of the Mexicans inside. The bluejackets then were enabled to proceed with the task they had in hand.

Escape From Fight Cut Off.

Despite the shelling it had received Tuesday, a squad of soldiers continued to give considerable trouble to the Americans from the battered Benito Juarez tower. After they had been silenced and removed from the tower it was discovered that the soldiers had continued fighting for lack of ability to do anything else. The shells from the warships Tuesday had torn away the stairway in the tower and the men had been compelled to remain in it.

Appeal From Aged Mexican.

Coincident with the orders for the general advance of the Americans an aged, white-haired Mexican, carrying the white flag of truce, came down a street from the center of the city. He carried a letter to the chief of police, the only authority he hoped to reach, and desired Consul Granada to read it. It was an urgent appeal to the chief of police to call off the snipers and prevent the bombardment he believed would follow if they continued their execution.

Even before the messenger had climbed the stairs into the consul's office Capt. Rush was informed of the contents of the note he bore and immediately sounded "cease firing" and "halt." But it was too late. The action had been begun all along the line and it was not considered wise to attempt further measures to stop it. The commanders ordered their men forward at double quick, which they carried out with a vigor that afterward gave them the city.

Evidences of War.

Blood-bespattered sidewalks, broken windows and bullet-scarred walls gave the plaza a grewsome aspect. Within the Diligencia hotel there were forty Americans, most of them women, who had been there since the commencement of hostilities. When the square was taken they were immediately notified that they might go on the Spanish cruiser Carlos V. outside the breakwater in order to give the Prairie room to fire her guns. The Spanish commander refused, saying that he dared not maneuver his boat in so small a space at night. He also declared that he needed to take on a supply of fresh water. Admiral Fletcher insisted yesterday that his order be carried out, and the Carlos V. moved outside just before the attrack on the center of the city began.

At 10.08 Wednesday morning the Americans were in undisputed possession of all the city except the southwest quarter, in which the barracks are situated, and a few outlying districts. At noon they had taken the barracks. When the city prison, which faces the main plaza, was captured, Lieutenant-Commander Buchanan of the Florida made an inspection tour through it. There was great surprise among the Mexicans who had gathered there that the prisoners were not released. They had been accustomed to seeing the victor always release prisoners and then impress them all into his army.

Chief of Police Captured.

Chief of Police Antonio Villa Vincencio was taken prisoner by the Americans shortly after they had occupied the main plaza of the city. It was suggested to him that he continue in his official capacity to direct the city's protective system. He took the question under advisement. Had the frightened mayor made up his mind to accede to Admiral Fletcher's suggestion, which was made through Consul Canada, the Mexicans might have been spared the humiliation of being forced from their positions and undoubtedly a number of lives would not have been sacrificed.

When Admiral Fletcher directed that battalions of bluejackets and marines be landed from Rear Admiral Badger's ships before dawn and be drawn up in the plaza before the railroad station, thence to proceed to take the entire town, he acted only after warning and after 15 shells from the Prairie's three-inch guns had been thrown into the steel framework of the new market, which faces Market place. A persistent but scattered fire came from rifles in the market during all the early hours of the morning, and Admiral Badger's men landed to the accompaniment of rifle bullets over their heads.

Uniforms Dyed With Rust.

When the rush started Admiral Badger's bluejackets, clad in orange colored clothing, made for them on the trip down by dyeing white uniforms with iron rust, moved in close column formation up the water front, past the market and across the front of the naval college, a long, three story structure built of adobe and having a tile roof. The column moved steadily forward until the first company had passed beyond the college and the remainder were covering the whole front close against the wall.

Suddenly a spatter of rifle firing broke out. Flashes from the rifles were plainly visible in the upper windows of the college and along the roofs. The jackies stood their ground pluckily. Some of them huddled close to the wall to avoid the rain of steel-jacketed bullets from above, while others dashed across a small open space directly in front of the building. These bluejackets dropped on their stomachs and lifted their rifles high to get a range on the windows above. Finally the American officers hustled their men either forward or backward until they were in the shelter of nearby buildings.

Men in Front Undaunted.

The jackies in front held their places, however, and the Prairie sent shell after shell from her three-inch battery into the windows of the college; huge columns of red dust leaped upward as each shot went home. The Chester also joined in, and with a roar her six-inch shells tore great gaps in the roof of the college. Far to the right of the harbor the mine ship San Francisco opened with her five-inch guns, and, taking the front of the college, shot out window after window, planting the shells with the precision of target practise.

After 15 minutes of firing the Prairie and the San Francisco ceased and the column of jackies formed again and pushed ahead, deploying around the front of the college. A few shots were directed at them, but none came from the college. The Chester continued hurling shells into any building in which snipers lurked and also far out into the suburbs.

The jackies went ahead without faltering, spreading out through the waterfront sections, seizing the highest buildings and organizing squads of guards at street intersections.

The fire along the front gradually slackened and then died out, but the Chester sent a few shots into the hills before ceasing. The Hancock, with 700 marines on board, and the battleship Michigan arrived too late to participate in the fighting.

Wounded and prisoners were taken aboard the Prairie until the arrival of the Solace, about noon.

Vera Cruz Thoroughly Cowed.

Conditions in Vera Cruz began to take on a normal aspect Thursday. Some of the restaurants were opened and a considerable part of the native population began to appear in the streets inspecting the damage done. There were no expressions of good will for the Americans, but there was no apparent antagonism. The Mexicans here seem thoroughly cowed and appear to accept with passiveness the presence of the foreign forces.

Animal Idiosyncracies.

Many are the idiosyncracies of animals. Some horses are afraid of a dog, some of a bit of paper, some of a bear, some of a car. I have known two mules to shy at a big yellow cucumber on a fence, and a cow we formerly owned could not endure to see any man's hat removed.

The oldest trick recorded of a riding animal is that of Balaam's ass, who tried to crush its rider's foot against the wall. Biting, pawing and bolting are also described in the Scriptures. A balky team figures in Esop and Chauser. That the horses of the Saracens used to shy is shown by the traditional inquiry, "If they thought King Richard was in that bush?" This same balking, or jibbing, in all its varieties is one of the most aggravating of vices.—From "A Farmer's Note Book," by C. E. Phelps.

Mrs. Nuwed—Yes; you see, it takes about $5 worth of other things to make the bread crumbs taste good.—Puck.

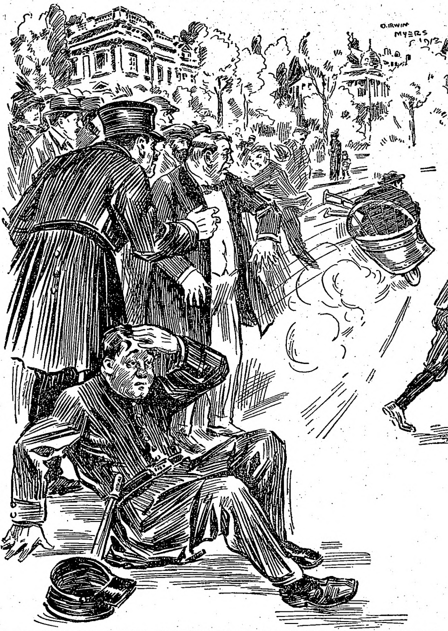
THE DEVIL CHAIR

A Chronicle of the Strange Adventures of John Haynes and His Gyroscope Vehicle

THE CRIPPLE OF PROSPECT PARK

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman)



AN INSTANT LATER THE CHAIR SHOT DOWN THE STREET WITH THE FORCE OF A TORNADO

Patrolman Daniel O'Sullivan, standing on the west side of Prospect park, Brooklyn, twirled his club and yawned. It was mid-day and the end of his period of duty was approaching. In ten minutes, he reflected, he would be hurrying homeward to snatch a rest in the bosom of his family within the six-room flat which he modestly sustained in the region of Flatbush.

He yawned again, not so much from weariness as by reason of a happy state of complete mental relaxation. At that moment Patrolman O'Sullivan felt at perfect peace with all the world. If at that instant a member of the Clancy gang had assailed him with an outburst of profanity against the land of his nativity, Patrolman O'Sullivan would have tapped him mildly across the hat and bidden him go home.

"By the powers!" he ejaculated joyfully, seeing a brother officer approaching him, "there's Mulcahey at last. Hey, Mul, git busy on the patrol. I'm for Klapperkopf's joint and a schooner of beer to wash the dust away!"

Mulcahey approached leisurely and relieved him; the two men engaged in a friendly joust of words, and Patrolman O'Sullivan turned his face resolutely eastward. The thought of the schooner smoothed out the wrinkles in his forehead and an anticipatory grin made itself visible about his mouth and extended its purview into the neighborhood of O'Sullivan's ears. Suddenly he paused and turned round, extending his right arm in the direction of the roadway.

"Holy saints, Mul, what the divil would yez call that?" he asked.

Moving slowly along the curb there came a cripple in a chair, which he was laboriously propelling by means of a handwheel. But as the patrolman walked in a leisurely fashion to intercept it, they perceived that it was like no other cripple's chair which had ever come within the range of their vision. To begin with, it was shaped like an old-fashioned infant's "perambulator;" that is to say, it was broad at the back and tapered in front to a wedge, tipped with a rim of steel, which gave it the forcible aspect of a miniature battering ram. It moved, apparently, by some hidden mechanical power, for under the seat was a steel-cased receptacle of considerable size, from whose hidden interior proceeded a faint humming sound exactly reminiscent of that made by a top whirling at full speed. O'Sullivan, as he bent low to examine the nature of this contrivance, knew immediately that the mechanism concealed within the case was not only extremely powerful, but was working at full speed, though it was in some way disconnected from the motive power of the chair, so that the latter could move forward at its pace of two miles an hour, propelled solely by the cripple's arms. So fast came the separate explosions of the gas engine, which was evidently a part of this complex arrangement, that they were merged into a single rolling sound.

"What the divil's thot, Jack?" exclaimed O'Sullivan profanely, rising flushed after the exertion of bending his comfortably covered body beneath the chair.

From the cushions a strange figure raised itself and regarded him. The occupant was a man of perhaps forty years. He was evidently a gentleman, although the blue suit that he wore was cheap and frayed and his wrists were innocent of cuffs. Mulcahey, whose mind did not turn toward mechanics, as did that of his friend, observed the peculiar pallor of the occupant's face. "Prison pallor," he thought immediately, and the closely cropped hair and stubble of a new beard confirmed in his own mind the fast awakening suspicions that he was forming. His glance turned toward the man's limbs. The legs hung limply as a paralytic's, and were evidently powerless. But what struck him most strongly were the arms. For while the left was, if anything, rather under-developed, the right was that of a Samson. Under the frayed sleeve Mulcahey could trace the outlines of the great muscles, rippling up from the wrist, and then the protruding biceps, and, under the arm, the triceps, rigid as steel. The man perceived his gaze and withdrew his right arm, flushing slightly as he did so.

"Now, who is he?" pondered Mulcahey. "I'd like to know. There's something queer about that fellow." His intuition struck home with the conviction of a fact: He determined that he would keep him in sight so long as he was on his post, but without awakening suspicions.

Meanwhile the cripple was answering O'Sullivan's questions.

"This is my chair, sir," he said courteously, and in well-bred tones which at once lulled the patrolman's suspicions to sleep. "I have been injured, as you can see, and have come here to meet Mr. Staples at one o'clock, when he returns to his house."

O'Sullivan was impressed. Mr. Staples, the multi-millionaire, who had begun his career as a poor lawyer and was now director of numerous western land companies, was a name to be respected. He did glance for a moment at the cripple's shabby coat, but reflected that many queer people came from all parts of the country to interview Mr. Staples, and so dismissed all further thought of the matter.

"Well, Mul, I'll see yez again," he said, and started off, twirling his club joyously, his mouth watering as he thought of that foaming schooner in which he was so soon to plunge it. But something about the chair was worrying him, and he had hardly proceeded three paces when it grew clear to him. He swung around. It seemed incredible, but—the chair was actually supported upon a single wheel!

O'Sullivan had worked as a mechanic before he joined the "force," and was never satisfied until all manner of mechanism was made clear to him. That he had failed, consciously to notice this astonishing phenomenon before was simply because his mind had never conceived the possibility of its existence. He looked again; yes, the chair stood bolt upright upon a single wheel.

"Mul! Mul!" he shouted. "Look here, me lad. Did yez iver see a chair that ran on one wheel before?"

Mulcahey looked again. Surely enough, his friend was right. O'Sullivan placed his powerful hands upon the side and tried to tilt the apparatus. His effort was as useless as though he had attempted to tilt St. Patrick's cathedral. The chair did not budge in the least, but remained still upon the sidewalk, perfectly motionless, and, as it seemed, busily humming itself to sleep.

"Hey! Beat it!" shouted Mulcahey, turning upon the curious crowd that had begun to assemble round the uncanny vehicle. He drove them away and then turned to the cripple again, scowling crossly. "You'll have to move on, young feller," he said. "Keep her a-moving and don't collect a crowd, or I'll run you and your chair into the station house."

The cripple returned no answer, but began slowly propelling his strange vehicle along the road that borders the park in the direction of Mr. Staples' house. He moved at his two-mile gait, and a small crowd followed him; but, as he made no answer to their badinage, they tired of worrying him and dispersed, with the exception of a few small boys, who ran alongside, jeering. Officer O'Sullivan remained standing beside his friend in an attitude of indecision. At last he drew the back of his hand across his mouth with a gesture of finality.

"Mul," he said, "they say as it's a wise cop knows when he's off duty—but that get's my goat. Something's going to happen. I feel it in me. And I'm going to stay and see it through."

Much as he needed the liquid refreshment which had presented its mental picture so alluringly to his mind, O'Sullivan felt that he could not go home until he had solved the mystery of that chair. He could think of no mechanical law which would enable it to balance itself upon a single wheel with such tenacity that, with the exertion of his utmost strength, he was unable to disturb its equilibrium. What was the hidden mechanism which gave out that buzzing sound? Suppose this were to be connected at will with the running gear! Suppose, for example, that, hidden under the seat of the chair, was a powerful gas engine, capable of exercising sufficient force to convert it, with a sharp, wedge-like front, into a battering ram and hurling it at thirty miles an hour through the crowded streets of the metropolis! A vista of possibilities stretched before O'Sullivan's mind. Muttering uneasily, he left Mulcahey and started in pursuit of the cripple, with the intention of questioning him further.

"Aw, it's only a bicycle chair!" exclaimed the other in disgust at his friend's curiosity, which he felt, in some vague way, to be a reflection upon his lack of interest. "What's biting you, Danny? Come back!" But O'Sullivan was already out of hearing and crossing the road in the cripple's wake, pausing only long enough to shoo away the pestilential small boys that dogged the trail of his quarry. A glance back showed that Mulcahey had changed his mind and was coming after him.

But to the disgust of both patrolmen the cripple's chair seemed to take on a sudden acceleration of motion. O'Sullivan walked faster. Yes, there was no doubt of it. Although to his eye the wheel did not seem to be revolving more rapidly, yet the distance between himself and the peculiar vehicle was materially increased. Then, remembering that the man would undoubtedly stop at Mr. Staples' house, he proceeded more slowly and permitted Mulcahey to catch up with him.

They were about five hundred yards behind when the chair came to a stop outside the millionaire's residence. They saw the crippled figure leave it and move painfully up the steps with the aid of two crutches. Long before they had come up the door had closed on the man, and, when at last they arrived, the empty chair was buzzing amiably upon the curb.

"I guess this story was straight enough—there's no use waiting, Mul," said Patrolman O'Sullivan. Mulcahey shook his head doubtfully. He was not sure; he was not by any means sure that, even if the cripple's exit were orderly and peaceful, he would not arrest him on the chance of having picked up an ex-convict. But even while he debated the front door flew open and the cripple came hurrying down the stairs with the aid of his crutches, while from within the hall resounded the screams of the maids, mingled with the shouts of the financier.

As the patrolman dashed to seize the fellow Staples came bounding down the steps.

"Arrest him!" he yelled, purple with fury. "He's an escaped convict and he's got five thousand dollars of mine, damn him, in his coat pocket. Held me up with a pistol and made me open my safe. Hold him!"

"We're holding him," answered Mulcahey grimly, as he clutched the man by the collar, while O'Sullivan extracted from his pockets a bulging wallet and a revolver. "Loaded in every chamber!" he exclaimed, inspecting it. "Hey, youse must be mad, young feller. This ain't no wild west show—this is Brooklyn!"

The cripple's face remained entirely impassive as the policeman bundled him back into his chair. Followed by the wrathful cries of the financier, they prepared to wheel him to the station house.

"My money!" cried Mr. Staples. "I identify that. He stole it from me a minute ago."

"Sorry, Mr. Staples," replied Mulcahey respectfully, "but you'll have to get it from the sergeant, sir. That's the law, Mr. Staples, and I'll have to take it with me. You can reclaim it any time, sir," he continued. "Or if you care to come along now—"

He had turned his back on the chair as he began to speak, while O'Sullivan, holding the pistol and the wallet, was pushing back the crowd which had instantly assembled, his arm resting upon the hand-wheel in order to keep the vehicle motionless. Of a sudden, quick as a flash, the cripple's mighty right arm shot forth and clutched him as in a vise; an instant later, and the chair had shot down the street with the force of a tornado, the wedge front scattering the mob right and left, hurling them upon the sidewalk and into the street. As O'Sullivan went down he felt the wallet torn from his clutch; before he could recover self-possession enough to fire, the vehicle was nowhere in sight; only far down the road a spiral column of dust showed the course it had taken.

The two patrolmen stared dismally at one another; Mulcahey from the curb, where he stood staring helplessly after the machine, O'Sullivan from the road, where he lay, dusty and torn. From the steps above Mr. Staples stormed for his money.

O'Sullivan held up a bleeding hand. It looked as though it had been torn by pincers of steel.

"It's gone, Mul," he said in hollow tones. "He got it away from me. My God, he must have been traveling at fifty miles an hour."

Mulcahey laughed derisively. "Fifty miles, eh?" he said, sneering. "Don't you suppose I'd hit him if he'd been going at fifty? Why, that was two hundred if it was one; the fellow was out of sight before I could draw me gun."

Then, dashing through the immense crowd which had blocked the roadway, he ran into a nearby telephone booth.

"Hello! Mr. Frank Staples has been held up and robbed at No. 3742 Prospect Park West by a man in an auto, wedge-shaped, running on a single wheel. Got that? Yes, a single wheel. Machine is making for Fulton street down Flatbush, meaning, of course, to cross into Manhattan and gain the country. Telephone all stationary posts and branch offices; call the bridge, Manhattan side, and have ropes stretched across the carriage road and footway or he'll get free. You've got less than three minutes to do it in."

He hung up the receiver and slouched back like a broken man, as indeed, he felt himself to be. This meant the finish of his career as a member of the police force. "Three minutes!" he muttered viciously. "Three seconds, more like. I'll bet he's over the bridge already. Unless—" de added, with a glimmer of hope—"he's had a collision."

But the man in the chair was too sagacious to collide with any vehicle that afternoon; the slightest jar of wheel against wheel would have plunged him, traveling at that fearful rate, to immediate death. And it was by reason of this sagaciousness that in point of fact the police actually were enabled to stretch ropes across the middle of the Brooklyn bridge before the strange vehicle arrived.

As soon as he had shaken off his pursuers and passed from the quiet residential section into the traffic-haunted region of Flatbush avenue the cripple displayed a singular indifference, as though he were supremely confident of his ability both to outwit and to outrun his enemies. He had sped toward Flatbush avenue at the rate of a hundred and fifty miles an hour, whirling so fast that he was completely hidden from sight in the clouds of dust flung up by the wheel. But when he reached that artery of traffic he had slowed down to not more than fifty miles. He whizzed past the traffic policeman who attempted to stay his progress, turned into a maze of small side streets, constantly diminishing his speed, and finally emerged upon Court street, gliding no faster than a man on a bicycle. He looked right and left for the fraction of a second as he neared Fulton street. It had been his intention to return across the Brooklyn bridge to Manhattan, but he had not calculated upon the presence of the two policemen, and it occurred to him that others might be waiting for him at the other end. But that risk was smaller than the one which would ensue should he become isolated upon Long island in a cordon, and so he swung into Fulton street and headed toward the East river, traveling at about twenty miles an hour. The wheel glided upon a rail of the car tracks, to which it adhered immediately without a single guiding motion of the driver's arm, and the pace began automatically to increase immediately. But the route became obscured by the approach of an up-town car, and the cripple swung his chair off the line again, upon which he had run merely as a test, and proceeded in a leisurely manner past Clark and Pineapple streets and so to the bridge entrance, where he disconnected his running gear and began to move by hand power toward the passenger track that crosses the center of the bridge.

None of the crowd was idle enough at that hour to examine the strange-looking vehicle closely, and it was obvious, from the lack of interest which the wayfarers displayed, that the news of the robbery had not yet become public property. The cripple patted his pocket as he moved deftly through the crowd toward the bridge footway. There, snugly ensconced in the leather wallet which he had taken from Mr. Staples lay ten thousand dollars in bills—his money, long overdue, of which he had been robbed when Staples had aided the land gang to railroad him to prison five years before. But he would not let his mind dwell upon that for the present, lest his anger invalidate his judgment; just now he must concentrate all his forces upon the endeavor to escape. And, once across the bridge and safe in Manhattan, he knew that nothing could prevent his progress.

He had threaded the crowds and was moving toward the footway when he heard shouts behind him. The news had just been telephoned to the stationary policemen on duty at that point, one of the fat elderly policemen who are detailed in their last years of duty to the lighter offices. The man was racing after him, puffing heavily as he ran. His tunic was unbuttoned and in one hand he held a heavy revolver, which he pointed as he ran, with no sure aim.

"Stop!" he yelled. "Stop right there or I'll fill you full of lead."

In the depths of the chair the cripple had another revolver, but he did not attempt to seize it. He had no quarrel with the officers of the law—only with the men who had leagued together to obtain his inheritance and put him away in the penitentiary at Nokomis Falls. He heard the hiss of bullets pass his ear, and, with a turn of his wrist, connected the running gear of the chair with the top-like mechanism within. The chair shot forward with a bound. Ahead of it lay a flight of steps, a formidable obstacle for the best auto-bicycle to have attempted to surmount. The policeman ran on, waving his revolver, reloading hastily as he proceeded, certain that the cripple would come to grief if he attempted to negotiate that obstacle. He had him fairly trapped. On either side lay the parapet of the footway; there remained nothing but surrender. He stopped to recover breath; and two brother officers from the Adams street station, who had received the summons a few minutes before, came panting up to join him. Then all three gasped in wonder.

For with a series of light, curvetting plunges, resembling those of a graceful colt, the chair leaped upward on its single wheel and, surmounting the steps, began to run easily at about fifty miles an hour across the bridge.

The way seemed clear. But, even as the chair gained the summit and raced forward, the cripple saw a body of police come running across the bridge toward him. They were from the Manhattan end, and, not content with stretching ropes to bring him to grief, had resolved to intercept him and gain the credit for his capture. On they ran, five abreast, thrusting the pedestrians aside, their revolvers in their hands, and barely a hundred yards distant.

The cripple stopped the chair dead and looked back. Behind him, not more than sixty yards away, the three Brooklyn policemen were in pursuit, led by the stout, elderly fellow who had fired at him ineffectually. As the chair stopped, with grinding and jarring of brakes that flung the cripple forward against the wedge front, the three men aimed again. But they did not dare to fire, for fear of hitting the policemen who were approaching from the opposite direction, and so ran forward, yelling to their quarry to surrender.

The cripple hesitated. To charge full tilt into the advancing men would undoubtedly kill them; but it might kill him. Besides, a chair is not an easy mark to miss, when it is advancing immediately upon one, whatever its speed, especially by five policemen, each firing a number of rounds, and each presumably practiced in the use of the revolver. The man looked upward. The immensely long loops of the steel cables, inclosed in their chilled steel casing, which held up the gigantic structure, lowered themselves here to a point barely five feet above the ground. Without further hesitation the cripple skipped nimbly out of the chair, clinging for support to the ironwork of the structure. Then, stretching forth his powerful right arm, he hoisted himself upon the cable, clinging there like some disabled monkey upon perch. The policemen yelled in triumph and precipitated themselves toward him from before and behind. The nearest was barely five and twenty yards away. The last was less than forty.

The cripple laughed shortly, and clinging now by the left hand, reached down and grasped the chair firmly with his right. Then, when his pursuers were almost upon him, they saw the muscles of his right stand out like loops of rope, saw him pick up the chair, and deposit it upon the narrow six-inch cable in front of him. It stood there, buzzing like a top and motionless, and, while the policemen stood still in amazement, the cripple climbed in, not budging the chair by a fraction of an inch, and was speeding away.

And looking at him, they did not even fire.

Not that they could have hit him even if they had tried. But awe, and something as nearly akin to terror as a New York policeman can feel restrained them. For this crippled man in the crazy car was soaring away, far over their heads, climbing to the very summit of the high structure along that six-inch cable, till at last he seemed no more than a black spot against the blue sky, running with security at the rate of an express train, with a drop of hundreds of feet into the river on one side of him, and, on the other, a fall to certain death upon the structure of the bridge.

He seemed to soar like an eagle; he reached the topmost tower, and then, seeing the pathway under him heavy with stalled cars, and the roadway black with cheering, gasping spectators—seeing, too, the ropes which had been ineffectually stretched forth to hold him, he laughed, waved his hand genially, and, at a tremendously accelerated pace, began to glide down the cable line that stretched to the Manhattan entrance.

He reached the end of it, traveling as steadily as a bicyclist, hit the asphalt with a gentle jolt twelve feet behind the little group of police who had idly gathered there, staring across the bridge, not thinking to glance upward; shot over the loops of the street car lines, and dashed into Park Row. Across the City Hall park he raced, crossed Broadway under the horses' noses; reached the river front, where nothing but slow-moving wagons blocked the wide street, and dashed northward at a rate of a hundred miles an hour. He reached the extreme limits of Manhattan, crossed into Westchester, and, like a streak of light, he entered the suburban districts, passed them, and so gained open country and was lost to the knowledge of all.

Ten minutes later he stopped the chair under a tree, descended, and bathed his face and hands in the water of a gurgling brook. That was the first of his exploits and there was much yet to be done. Vengeance on all who had banded against him, broken up his home, thrust him for five lonely years into the western jail—this must be meted out. But now, having regained a tiny fraction of his own, he had funds with which to start on his immediate quest, the discovery of his daughter Eleanor. She had been fourteen when he last saw her; now she must be nearly twenty. The thought of seeing her again gave him new hope. He entered the chair, and at the leisurely pace of fifteen miles an hour, set off toward the north, along the old post road.

Peacock Alley Gets Its Annual Spring Cleaning

NEW YORK.—When George W. Boldt of the Waldorf-Astoria decided several years ago that he would put an end to the business of numerous individuals who were fleecing his patrons out of several millions a season, he did things thoroughly. He hired Joe Smith of Scotland Yard, and told him it was worth $25,000 a year to have the famous hostelry cleaned of vermin.

WHAT HAVE YOU GOT ON ME ?

Joe Smith organized a squad of ten men and women, known to Mr. Boldt and himself about the Waldorf, where they circulate in Fifth avenue clothes. Mr. Smith and his squad have just finished their annual spring clean-up.

Kitty Quick, "Lord Harry" Havens, and a third suave gentleman w[illegible] at the head of the procession of ejected.

A week previous one of the Smith women agents, passing herself as a shopper who took tea in the Waldorf frequently, observed Kitty, "Lord Harry" and three others, two women and a man, very active in entertaining a wealthy patron.

Joe went into his office and studied the Waldorf collection of 5,000 photographs. These show faces of confidence persons, hotel thieves and international crooks.

Kitty was there, and so was Harry. A few hours later a captain of waiters removed from the table at which the confederates were dining a set of glasses of which they had just time to take one sip. He used gloves.

The glasses were soon in Joe Smith's studio. They were dusted with a prepared powder and photographed. Joe smiled.

That afternoon Joe, who is a polished gentleman in appearance as well as in reality, strolled up Peacock alley and met Kitty of the $150 Paris hat.

"Madam," said the Scotland Yard man, quietly, "the management would like to know your precise business in this hotel?"

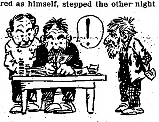
"What have you got on me?" she replied, descending to the vernacular.

"A photograph and two fine sets of finger prints."

Peacock alley had had its annual spring cleaning.

$11,000 Found in "Hump" on a Beggar's Back

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—William Kahler, an old hunchback beggar, who has toddled these twenty years or more along the streets of San Francisco with the aid of a cane as old and battered as himself, stepped the other night from his lowly estate of a mendicant into the class of capitalists.



For more than twenty years Kahler had kept pretty much out of everybody's way, gathering a nickel here and a dime there from the good people who took compassion on a feeble old cripple with a grizzled, ragged beard, dressed in tatters. The police never troubled Kahler unless it was to throw him a coin.

Then Kahler was arrested—by a mistake. The man who arrested him did not know Kahler. Desk Sergeant Dunne at the central police station was about to chide Policeman Oliver Cox, who made the arrest, and then Dunne thought Kahler would be just as well off in a cell as sleeping under some sidewalk or in some tumble-down barn.

Dunne passed his hand over the beggar's back. It was hard. He rapped it. The hump sounded like a tin pail. Kahler was divested of the rag that once was a coat and of the aged vest.

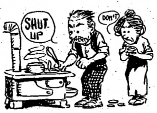
When the vest came off there was disclosed a neatly made artificial hump of tin, strapped to Kahler's body over his shoulders and under his arms. It opened with an ingenious clasp at the top. Dunne opened it, and when he and Cox looked, they nearly fainted.

Within were layers on layers of greenbacks of all denominations, from $5 to $500. The policemen started to count.

They found just $11,000, and discovered that Kahler was as straight as an arrow.

Wife Tells How Her Husband Made Spurious Cash

ST. LOUIS, MO.—Mrs. Lulu Bush of 366 Carrie avenue told Police Captain O'Brien the other day of watching her husband make counterfeit money almost nightly for five months in their home. The husband, William C. Bush, was arrested after a policeman had found a mold for making counterfeit half dollars, two spurious half dollars and one spurious nickel in the Bush home.

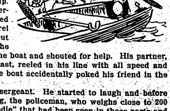


Bush's home was searched by Policeman Pribble after an informant had told him there was a counterfeiting plant at the Carrie avenue address. The mold, made of wood and consisting of two pieces, was found in a bureau drawer. The counterfeit coins were under a carpet near the bureau. Bush denied knowledge of the mold or bad coins.

"I warned him against making the money," she said, "but he told me to mind my own business. He said it was an easy way to get money."

Story of How Ticklish Angler Lost Big Pickerel

CHICAGO.—A sergeant of police at one of the stations is reputed to be the most ticklish policeman in the Chicago department. No one can touch him in the ribs without having him almost turn a somersault. He is pestered to death by the other members of the force at the station, who delight in seeing his contortions. Recently this policeman went on a fishing trip with a friend. The two passed a couple of weeks at Pelican lake, Wisconsin. It was the last day of their sojourn that they had the experience of their trip.



They were in a boat and the sergeant cast a line to which was hooked a frog as bait, when a large pickerel seized the frog and jumped about three feet out of the water. The angler became excited, stood up in the boat and shouted for help. His partner, who had just completed a perfect cast, reeled in his line with all speed and in turning to put his rod down in the boat accidentally poked his friend in the ribs with it.

It was too much for the police sergeant. He started to laugh and before his friend knew what was happening, the policeman, who weighs close to 200 pounds, performed the prettiest "Brodie" that had been seen in those parts and disappeared after the escaping fish. He came to the surface and heard his comrade shouting. Disgusted, he swam to shore. The fish got away.

His friend, who had been amazed by his plunge from the boat and his subsequent ill-temper, realized for the first time what the trouble was and by an humble apology restored himself to the sergeant's favor.

HAS NO TIME FOR HOBBIES

"I fear I must be very trite," remarked Mrs. Dunne, wife of the governor of Illinois, during her recent visit to Washington, "and say home, my husband and children are all my fads and accomplishments, and certainly the whole of my mission in life. I believe even the most indefatigable of modern women would find scant leisure for hobbies in the care of such a household as is mine. Thirteen children have come to bless our home and of these all lived to be old enough for us to possess a keen sense of loss in their passing away. There are ten now with us, although the oldest boy is married and has set his own rooftree. He is Edward F., Jr., and there is a chubby little son, Edward F. III, who is, as may be imagined, quite the idol of the family. I do not wish to repeat truisms and obvious facts, but I number myself among those who find the crown of womanhood in rearing large families and governing a home to the satisfaction of all. In these days of complicated interests and of luxurious living, such work can be easily exalted into a vocation. I have never found myself lacking interest in passing affairs through the care of my home and family and I should not rate these cares as either benumbing intellectually or drudgery in the physical sense. To use that favorite phrase, I believe I have had time to grow soul and mind since my marriage."

WILL PROBE SOCIAL UNREST

The only woman representative on the federal industrial relations commission, which is soon to begin the most complete and thorough probe ever undertaken into existing social unrest, with the view of making recommendations for constructive legislation, is Mrs. J. Borden Harriman of New York, who has for years been engaged in many public and useful activities in the metropolis.

Congress has appropriated $100,000 for the first year's work of the inquiry, recommending at the same time that the commission should lay out a program on a three years' basis and could count on a fund for expenses of $500,000. The chairman of the commission is Frank P. Walsh of Kansas, one of the best equipped men in the country for such work. There are seven other male members of the commission, representing both labor and capital.

Mrs. Harriman has been engaged in what has been termed "uplift" work among the toilers of the metropolis and is at present in Washington, where her influence is being exerted to prevent certain threatened strikes. Before she became a member of the commission she had organized a company to provide ice cream sodas for poor working girls at minimum price, and earlier than that she had converted her country place into a sanitarium for the benefit of weary millionaires.

SENATOR SHIELDS' "NERVOUS GOATS"

Senator John K. Shields of Tennessee possesses some specimens of a breed of goats that are the most unique in the animal world. Shields has a 3,000-acre ranch in Granger county, a beautiful home on it and he devotes the place largely to Shetland ponies and Angora goats.

The Angoras he raises for their hair, and this proves a profitable investment, as they can live on wild land on which a horse would starve. The meat, too, is fine, very much like lamb. But the thing on which he prides himself most is that he owns several of what is known as "nervous goats."

This is a breed said by the agricultural department to be peculiar to Tennessee and unknown in any other place. These goats are remarkable for the fact that if any one should get near them and fire off a pistol or even crack a whip sharply the goats instantly fall to the ground, lie on their backs and remain there stiffly with their feet in the air for some time. On this account they have been called "nervous goats."

Once Governor Frazer was talking to the senator, and the latter invited him to witness the performance.

"No, no," objected the governor. "It's hard enough believing it when you hear it. I simply could not see the thing demonstrated for anything!"

"Why not?" asked Shields.

"Because if I did," protested the governor, "I could not help telling about it, and every time I did some one would remark that I was a pretty poor liar!"

TO COMMAND SHIPS IN PANAMA CANAL

Capt. Hugh Rodman, U. S. N., will be the real boss of the big sluiceway when it is open for commercial shipping next July, and will have entire charge of all the details of putting ships through.

Each vessel entering the canal will be assigned a canal pilot, who will take the ship to an anchorage, from which she may not move without permission of Captain Rodman or one of the port captains, conveyed through the pilot.

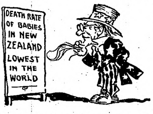
As soon as a ship moves toward the canal its wireless and all signal arrangements will be under the immediate control of the canal authorities. The engines of a ship will be locked by the canal officials by means of a steel chain and sealing device. This lock will be under the constant watch of a canal guard and an engineer of the ship, until after leaving the locks, when its removal will be ordered by the canal pilot aboard.

The pilots have been selected by Captain Rodman, and for three months he has been instructing and training them.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Where Infant Death Rate Dropped 50 Per Cent

WASHINGTON.—Miss Julia C. Lathrop of Chicago, head of the children's bureau of the department of labor, has completed a report on baby-saving in New Zealand which was transmitted the other day to Secretary of Labor Wilson. New Zealand was selected for this special study because its infant mortality rate is the lowest of any country in the world. This creditable showing, Miss Lathrop says, is due to the activity of the Society for the Health of Women and Children, whose methods, she says, could be followed with success in this country.



DEATH RATE OF BABIES IN NEW ZEALAND LOWEST IN THE WORLD

In a letter of transmittal, Miss Lathrop says:

"The infant mortality rate of New Zealand has been for some time recognized as the lowest of any country in the world, and it is stated that recent further reductions are due in large measure to the activity of the society.

"As an example of its value, the consul general says that work of the society has reduced infant mortality in Dunedin, a residential city of about 60,000 inhabitants, 50 per cent during five years, from 1907 to 1912.

"Because of the absence of adequate birth and death registers in the United States, the infant death rate of this country as a whole is unknown, but some states tend to show that it is at least twice the rate in New Zealand, which the register general of that country reported in 1912 to be 51 per 1,000.

"New Zealand, like certain of our states, is a young and vigorous country with a scattered population and with no large cities, and there is every reason to believe that similar volunteer effort in this country would produce similar results."

Taken for Stealing; She Has $1,700 in Her Purse

ON entering one of the big downtown department stores the other day a little, gray-haired woman, wan and wrinkled and poorly dressed, and fully seventy-five years old, stood and gazed about her as if startled at all the magnificence she beheld. She took a few steps forward and then stopped, apparently uncertain which direction to take. She attracted the attention of Detective Messer, and he watched her.

Hesitatingly she approached a counter on which were displayed fancy high-priced shirtwaists. She fingered the finery lovingly, and every now and then glanced around to see if anyone was looking. Messer smiled sympathetically. He was beginning to wish he could afford to turn philanthropic, when suddenly his sympathy was shocked.

Quickly glancing to the right and left, the aged woman filched a $20 shirtwaist from the counter, hastily tucked it beneath her shawl and started for the door. In an instant the officer had his hand on her shoulder and was drawing her aside.

"Put that waist back and then beat it," said he.

Then, to the detective's astonishment, the woman produced a purse and revealed $1,700. She drew out the bills and pressed them upon the officer.

"Here—take it all," she pleaded. "Take everything, only please let me go."

After being regularly booked at the first precinct station and learning that she would be released on $20 bail, her tears ceased to flow, and instead of pleading she became indignant and commanding. Fishing out a $20 bill she tossed it on the sergeant's desk and then walked away. She forfeited her bail in police court.

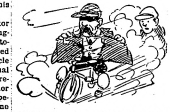
Osages Not Bothered by the High Cost of Living

JUDGE JOHN E. SHORT of Oklahoma, who was in Washington recently, gave a little interview about the Osage Indians, which was of great interest. He prefaced the interview with remarks that the commissioner of Indian affairs, Cato Sells, is a godfather to the Indians. He then said of the Osages:

"The high cost of living does not bother the Osages, for money is piling in to them so fast they are unable to spend their interest and royalties, to say nothing of the millions which the government is holding in trust for them. I have just been advised by wire from Pawhuska that in a sale of 12,000 acres for gas and oil leasing purposes only the Osages received a bonus in excess of $500,000, and in addition to this amount these Indians receive a royalty of one-eighth of all the oil produced and a cash price for each gas well. When it is considered that the oil production in the Osage country amounts to 1,000,000 barrels a month and the Indians receive about 15 cents on each barrel produced, this one item alone amounts to $150,000 a month, and, in addition to this, each of the 2,000 members of the tribe has $5,000 on deposit with the government for a rainy day. As the average income for each family is in excess of $2,500 a year, there is no immediate danger of the trust funds being disturbed."

Spread Out His Coat and the Wind Did the Rest

SENATOR WALSH of Montana, possessor of the finest horseshoe mustache in the senate, is a person of singular pertinacity of purpose. Should it occur to him that he had to move a red-hot stove he would move it, his friends say, even if it burned both hands off. The verb "to quit" is not found in his lexicon.



A number of years ago Senator Walsh and C. P. Connolly, now a magazine writer, were young lawyers together in Montana. They determined with some others, to make a bicycle tour through the Yellowstone National park. All went well until, on the return journey to Livingston, Senator Walsh's sprocket chain was broken beyond repair. Now, the Yellowstone valley in its approaches to the town of Livingston, is noted as one of the windiest places on earth. Jim Bridger, who put the Yellowstone on the map, asserted in his time that he had seen the wind there blow the hair off a dog, and none disputed the statement. No one, in fact, disputed any of Jim's assertions, he being a handy man with a gun.

Under these circumstances, Senator Walsh announced that he didn't need the sprocket-chain at all to make distance. He said that all he had to do was to sit in the seat, spread his coat and let the wind do the rest.

"And do you know," said Mr. Connolly in telling the story, "after he had fallen off ten times he still believed in his theory. We had to bind and gag him and throw him into a wagon before he would consent to proceed in any way save by wind power."

DELEGATES TO BE NAMED AS PEACE ENVOYS DESIRE

U. S., HUERTA AND CARRANZA TO BE REPRESENTED AT MEDIATION CONFERENCES FROM NOW ON.

REBELS FORMALLY REFUSE TO AGREE TO ARMISTICE

Asserted That No Form of Treaty Can Ever Be Arranged Between Constitutionalists and Huerta—Arbitrators May Change Their Seat of Actions.

Washington, May 5.—The mediation plans of the South American envoys who are trying to straighten out the troubled affairs of Mexico, are going steadily forward, the next step in their procedure receiving most careful attention.

Delegates to Be Named.

The United States, the Huerta government and General Carranza are expected to name their delegates, as requested by the mediators Saturday night, within the next day or two.

The delegates for the United States have not yet been selected but it has became known that it will not be officials closely identified with the government.

Will Name Outsider.

As the three South American envoys are accredited to the United States this government does not wish to name a government official to deal with them, but to have an outsider who would deal with them without reference to their official relations to the United States.

This has eliminated Robert L. Lansing, counsellor of the state department, and in general all other government officials. To the names of John Bassett Moore and John Lind and Henry White, already mentioned, are now added those of Richard Olney, former secretary of state; Dr. David Jayne Hill, former ambassador to Germany, and Hannis Taylor, former minister to Spain.

De La Barra Expected.

The Huerta delegate is expected to be Francisco De La Barra, now Mexican minister at Paris, but nothing definite has been heard from Mexico City. A Mexico City dispatch, however, says Jcaquin D. Casasus, former Mexican ambassador to the United States, has been hurriedly ordered to proceed to Washington from Carlsbad, where he has been taking the cure. The nature of his mission was not made public though.

Carranza Delegate Arrives.

Rafael Zubaran, personal representative of General Carranza, arrived here and is available as the Carranza delegate, although his particular mission in coming from Carranza is still to be announced and it is not yet definite that Carranza will go to the extent of naming a delegate to deal with the mediators.

When the delegates of the three parties arrive, it is expected the mediators will be ready to take up the crucial issues between the United States and Huerta at least, and, if possible, between Huerta and Carranza. Whether a plan of adjustment can be worked out is still an open question, even in the minds of the mediators. They expect the delegates from the three parties to assist them to get together on some middle ground. The mediators will continue to be the main body formulating a plan of settlement, as the delegates from the three parties will have no plenipotentiary powers and will act merely as advisers.

Carranza Refuses Armistice.

It became definitely established Sunday that General Carranza would not agree to the request of the mediators that he suspend military operations against Huerta pending the mediation proceedings and the envoys have been advised of this decision. It has been apparent for several days that Carranza intended to rush the army southward, but it was not until then that this was communicated as a finality.

It is said this will have no effect on checking the general plans of mediation, which will go steadily forward.

No Mediation Possible.

Close associates of Carranza, who have now arrived here, say that no mediation between them and Huerta is possible and that any move on the part of the three mediators to include in their program such a scheme for the general adjustment of Mexican affairs will be regarded as being outside the scope of their labors.

Carranza's refusal of an armistice with Huerta is the first adverse reply the mediators have received. On the other hand, favorable comment is made in circles close to the envoys upon the amenability Huerta has shown.

Aside from the personnel of the delegates from the three parties to the controversy, the mediators have given some informal consideration as to whether it may become desirable to go to some neutral point outside of Washington to carry forward their negotiations with the three parties concerned.

The only purpose in this would be to forestall the feeling on the part of any one of the parties that their sessions at the seat of government here might tend to a leaning toward the viewpoint of the United States.

ENEMY APPEARS TO BE HOSTILE

OVER 10,000 MEXICANS WATCHING VERA CRUZ.

Gen. Funston Reports to Wotherspoon and Garrison that Federals are Throwing Up Defenses.

Washington, May 5.—Dispatches from Brigadier-General Funston on the situation at Vera Cruz were the subject of a long conference at the war department between Secretary Garrison and Major General Wotherspoon, chief of staff of the army. It was said General Funston has asked for instructions in view of the hostile attitude of the Mexican army near the city.

Earlier the general had reported that the American outposts at Vera Cruz were being watched by the Mexicans, and there were over 10,000 troops encamped in the vicinity. These dispatches were summed up by Secretary of War Garrison in the following statement:

"I am in receipt of a dispatch from General Funston regarding the incident at the pumping plant. He says that the officer in command of the Mexican troops was Major Zapota, of the engineer corps of the Mexican army. He refers to the fact that very little dependable news about the conditions in the interior is coming in, because no more refugees are now coming into Vera Cruz.

"It is reported to him that General Maas has about 4,000 men at Soledad, and there are an unknown number, not larger, watching our lines. He understands that the Mexicans have 5,000 troops at Jalapa, and about 1,500 at Palma, where they are throwing up defenses. He says that there are many wild rumors afloat which are not worthy of credence. Some provision sellers came into the city from the north.

"The city is entirely quiet. A Mexican officer who was in Vera Cruz in civilian clothes was directed to leave."

GENERAL D. E. SICKLES DIES

Had Been Prominent Figure in Affairs of United States for Over Half Century.

New York, May 5.—General Daniel E. Sickles died at his home here. His wife was at his bedside at the end. Mrs. Sickles had been estranged from her husband for more than a quarter of a century.

The final reconciliation was brought about largely through the efforts of their son, Stanton, it is understood, the general recently having made advances to his wife when assured by Stanton that they would be met half way.

General Sickles' death was due to cerebral hemorrhages and paralysis. General Sickles was born in New York city, Oct. 20, 1825.

In 1844 he was admitted to the bar, and three years later, after dabbing in local politics with some success, he was elected to the legislature. In 1853 he was appointed corporation counsel of New York, and during the same year went to London as secretary to James Buchanan, then minister to the court of St. James and later president of the United States.

Upon his return to the United States Sickles was elected to the New York senate, and later became a member of congress.

During the Civil war General Sickles began his career which since then has kept him almost continuously in the eye of the public. His was one of the most prominent figures in that great struggle and he emerged from it severely crippled.

In 1869 General Sickles was made minister to Spain.

UNIT OF ARMY IN VERA CRUZ

Forces Under Funston Will Be Sufficient to Advance on Mexico City After Saturday.

Galveston, Tex., May 1.—A complete unit of the United States army, prepared to advance on Mexico City, will be under command of Brigadier General Frederick Funston when the troops of the Sixth cavalry, regimental headquarters of the field artillery and the horses and mules of both the cavalry and field artillery, which sailed on the converted transport San Marcos, reach Vera Cruz Saturday.

The San Marcos carries the advance of artillery, while the 350 mules aboard will pack the mountain guns already en route to Vera Cruz. Other troops and great quantities of supplies are here ready to be sent to Vera Cruz.

Col. Lucien G. Berry of the Fourth field artillery, was senior in command on the San Marcos, which carries 17 officers, 300 enlisted men and 360 horses and mules.

Anti-Trust Bill Approved,

Washington, May 4. — The house judiciary committee ordered favorably reported the omnibus anti-trust bill.

American to Be Executed.

Washington, May 2.—Unofficial reports reaching Washington that Dr. Edward Ryan, an American in the service of the United States government, looking after refugees, was to be executed as a spy at Mexico City, caused Secretary Bryan to make urgent representations in behalf of Dr. Ryan to the Spanish ambassador, General Huerta's representative here. Secretary Bryan said that no news of Dr. Ryan's reported plight had reached him through official circles.

EMBARGO ON ARMS IMPORTATION INTO STATE OF COLORADO

COMMANDER OF THE FEDERAL TROOPS IN STRIKE ZONE ISSUES VERY DRASTIC ORDERS.

ALL SALOONS OF TRINIDAD ARE ORDERED KEPT CLOSED

To Remain Under Ban While Tension Lasts—Pay Day at Mines Necessitates Extra Precautionary Measures—Plans Laid By Unions for Rebuilding Tent Colony.

Trinidad, Colo., May 5.—Major W. A. Holbrook, in command of the federal troops in Colorado, has placed an embargo upon the importation of arms or ammunition into the state. He announced that any arms shipped in violation of the order will be confiscated.

Applies to All Munitions.

The order applies to any arms or ammunition for the use of any person whatever except for the use of the federal troops.

Major Holbrook sent a letter to Mayor W. P. Dunlavy directing him to keep the saloons of Trinidad closed until further orders.

Prohibits Saloons' Opening.

The order prohibiting the reopening of the saloons is contained in a personal letter to the mayor, in which Major Holbrook says:

"There seeems to be an agitation on foot to re-open the saloons in this county.

"Considering the situation as now existing a most serious one, and that the demands of humanity, as well as of expediency, require the saloons to remain closed, I, as commander of the federal forces in this district, hereby direct that all saloons remain closed until further orders."

Provides Pay Day Guards.

Major Holbrook provided troopers as guards for the day, as this is pay day for the companies and the strikers, and would not permit either the operators or the unions to have armed men on duty when the men were paid off. The soldiers accompanied the paying officers to the different camps.

Wants List of Dead.

Coroner B. B. Sipe received a telegram from John Schwager, Austro-Hungarian consul in Denver, asking him for a list of all subjects of Austria-Hungary who had been killed in strike battles. The coroner announced that the inquest over the men killed in the Forbes battle would be had early in the week.

Further negotiations regarding the disarmament of the strikers are believed to be in abeyance until the arrival of the Eleventh cavalry, which is expected Monday night or early Tuesday. Several leaders of the United Mine Workers yesterday had a conference with Major Holbrook. At its conclusion it was stated that the subject of disarmament had not been discussed.

To Rebuild Ludlow Camp.

Officers of the union visited the site of the Ludlow tent colony to make plans for rebuilding the camp. It is explained that the new colony probably would be located just to one side of the ruins of the old one. The strikers have ordered material, and are ready to begin work as soon as formal permission from the army authorities is secured.

John R. Lawson left for Indianapolis to attend a meeting of the international executive board of the United Mine Workers of America.

COL. JAMES LOCKETT IS GIVEN SUPREME COMMAND

Washington, May 4. —Orders to quadruple the force of federal cavalrymen in the Colorado coal strike regions has been given by the war department. The entire Eleventh regiment from Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, and two troops of the Twelfth from Fort Robinson, Neb., were ordered to proceed to the scene at once. Col. James Lockett of the Eleventh will take supreme command of the situation.

Under authority of President Wilson the secretary of war also issued a proclamation calling on the people in the strike district of Colorado to surrender all arms and ammunition to the United States army officers

Detective Burns is Attacked.

Marietta, Ga., May 4.—William J. Burns, the detective, was the center of an angry demonstration when he came here, presumably in connection with an investigation of the case of Leo M. Frank, the Atlanta factory superintendent, in connection with the death of Mary Phagan. One man in a large crowd that surrounded Burns when his identity was discovered, struck the detective in the face. Others threatened Burns with violence if he made any move to resist the man

Girl Who Became Mrs. Vincent Astor

VINCENT ASTOR IS MARRIED

Wealthiest Young Man Is Wedded to His Life Long Friend.

Staatsburg, N. Y., May 1.—William Vincent Astor, head of the family established in America a century and a quarter ago by John Jacob Astor, the German fur trader, and, perhaps the wealthiest young man in the world, was married here at noon to Miss Helen Dinsmore Huntington, at the home of his bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Robert P. Huntington.

Since the tragic death of his father, who went down with the Titanic, made him master of the great fortune long associated with the Astor name, Vincent Astor has gained a prominence not altogether due to his wealth. His interest in philanthropy and social betterment has kept his name before the public, and his marriage to a girl whom he has known since childhood gives more than a touch of romance to the union.

ARMY CONTROLS VERA CRUZ

FLETCHER SURRENDERS COMMAND TO GEN. FUNSTON.

American Soldiers Stir Mexican City By the Precision With Which They Do Things, It Is Said.

Vera Cruz, May 2.—The guarding of Vera Cruz and its environs has now been completely taken over from the navy by Brigadier General Frederick Funston and the Fifth infantry brigade of the United States Army.

While martial law still continues in force the actual municipal government is conducted by Robert J. Kerr, the American civil governor, who has enlisted the aid of Mexican officials to act under his superintendency and in accordance with Mexican laws.

The American troops, once on shore, were lined up along the docks and in the railroad yards and marched to the posts assigned to them in various parts of the city and its outlying suburbs.

As the various detachments swung into the streets, their flags flying and with bands playing martial airs leading them, the natives appeared on their balconies or came out onto the sidewalks and gazed with undisguised wonder at the solid ranks of brown clothed men. The people seemed to marvel at the precision of the American soldiers' movements and the sturdy appearance of the men in the ranks. Many American civilians who had been taking their breakfast outdoors left their tables and watched with pride the passing of the newly arrived troops, shouting volleys of "hurrahs" and waving hats or handkerchiefs at them.

Shortly after the last of the troops had passed through the central streets of the city, Brigadier General Funston with several aides drove by in a carriage and was greeted with an outburst of applause.

When the men had taken up their stations and the reports had been received by Brigadier General Funston, official calls were exchanged between Rear Admiral Charles J. Badger, Governor Robert J. Kerr and Brigadier General Funston.

Later an order was issued by Rear Admiral Fletcher, who had been in command of the operations ashore since the landing of the American naval forces. The order covered the whole of the events since the taking of the city.

Trust Bill is Hurried.

Washington, May 4.—Senators interested in anti-trust legislation prepared to get the bill proposing an inter-state trade commission the so-called trust bill, into the senate on the heels of the Panama canal tolls repeal bill, on which debate has begun.

American Red Cross in Charge.

Washington, May 1. — Active charge of relief operations at Vera Cruz will be assumed by the American Red Cross. This decision was reached as a result of a personal cablegram received by Miss Mabel T. Boardman, chairman of the national relief board of the Red Cross, from Rear Admiral Fletcher. The Red Cross cabled authority to General Funston and later transferred that authority to the newly appointed civil governor. Robert J. Kerr, to draw on Red Cross funds to the extent of $55,000 for relief work.

WHAT MEXICANS HAVE FOUGHT FOR

Agrarian Democracy Has Been the Aim of the Peon Class for Past Century.

STRUGGLE STILL GOING ON

Position of Revolutionists and Constitution of 1857 for Which They Stand, Set Forth in Book by Senor de Lara.

In the confusion and lack of exact knowledge that attend the embroglio with Mexico the big issue that has moved the Mexican people to revolt against Huerta has been lost sight of or is not known to most Americans.

What the people of Mexico have fought for from the first war of independence, and what they are fighting for now under Carranza and Villa is the right to buy and till farms. For a hundred years the peon class has waged a continuous struggle to achieve agrarian democracy. Time after time the revolution has been carried to the verge of success, and time after time the Mexican ruling class has invoked foreign intervention in order to prolong its power.

All this and a great deal more is made clear in a book just published by Doubleday, Page & Co., "The Mexican People; Their Struggle for Freedom," by L. Gutierrez de Lara and Edgcomb Pinchon. It is frankly a statement of the position of the revolutionists, and shows why they believe American intervention in Mexico at the present time would only bring about more loss of life and worse conditions in the long run.

Senor de Lara has much to say about the constitution of 1857, that has been ruthlessly set aside by successive governments, and he gives a digest of that instrument, the heads of which follow:

Article 1. The Mexican people recognize that the rights of men are the foundation and the purpose of social institutions. In consequence they proclaim that all the laws and authorities of the country must respect and sustain the warranties stipulated by this constitution.

Article II. In the republic every one is born free. The slaves who step into the national territory recover their freedom by this mere fact, and have the right of the protection of the law.

Article III. All education is free. The law will determine which profession needs a diploma for its exercise, and what requisites are to be fulfilled.

This fundamental principle was later amplified to make education universal, free, non-sectarian and compulsory.

Article IV. Every man is free to adopt the profession, trade, or work that suits him, it being useful and honest; and to enjoy the product thereof.

Article V. No man shall be compelled to work without his plain consent and without just compensation. The state will not permit to become effective any contract, pact or agreement with the purpose of the curtailment, the loss or the irrevocable sacrifice of the liberty of any man, may the cause be for personal labor, education, or religious vows. The law in consequence does not recognize monastic orders, and will not permit their establishment, no matter what may be the denomination or purpose for which they pretend to be established. Neither will be permitted a contract or agreement by which a man makes a pact for his proscription or exile.

Article VI. The expression of ideas shall not be subjected to any judicial or governmental prosecution except in cases of attack upon the public morality, the rights of a third party, or the prevention of a crime or a disturbance of public order.

Article VII. The liberty of writing and publishing writings upon any matter is inviolable. No previous censorship nor imposition of bonds upon the writers nor the publishers for the purpose of curtailing the freedom of the press can be established by any law or authority, such freedom being restricted to respect of private life, morals and public business.

Article VIII. This deals with the right of petition to the government.

Article IX. This gives the right of assembly.

Article X. This establishes the right of every man to possess and carry arms for his safety and legitimate defense.

Article XI. This deals with immigration to the country and other traveling both from the country and into the same.

Article XII. This establishes the invalidity of all titles of nobility, prerogatives and hereditary honors.

Article XIII. In the Mexican Republic no one shall be subjected to private laws nor special courts. No man or corporation shall enjoy fueros or receive emoluments unless they be a compensation for public services and already fixed by law.

Article XIV. This establishes the principle that no one shall be tried by retroactive laws.

Article XV. No treaties can be made for the extradition of political offenders; neither for those criminals whose crime was committed in a country where they had been slaves; neither can a treaty or agreement be made by which the warranties or rights that this constitution gives to man or citizen be altered.

Article XVI. This article establishes the principle that the family and domicile are inviolable, except for the purposes of arrest under a warrant from a proper court expressing the charge.

Article XVII. No one shall be arrested or imprisoned for debts of a purely civil character. No one shall exercise violence to claim his rights. The courts will always be ready for the administration of justice. This will be free, the costs being abolished.

Article XXVII. Private property shall not be taken without the consent of the owner, except in case of public utility, and by just payment therefor. Religious corporations or institutions, no matter of what denomination, character, durability or purpose, and civil corporations when under the patronage, direction or superintendency of religious institutions, or ministers of any cult, shall not have the legal capacity to acquire or manage any real estate except the buildings which are used immediately and directly for the services of the said institutions; neither will the law recognize any mortgage on any property held by these institutions.

Article XXVIII. State and church are independent. Congress cannot make any law establishing or forbidding any religion.

The practical abrogation of the constitution under Diaz and Huerta has resulted in the building up of a privileged class and the cruel exploitation of the people. Vast territories have passed into private ownership. The disinherited peon has become the virtual slave of the land owners, and freedom has been a privilege purchased from the government by those who had the means.

These are the conditions that De Lara pictures, and it is to end them the present fight of the constitutionalists is waging.

FORCED TO BUY PROTECTION

Refugees Arriving at Vera Cruz Tell of Paying Money to Huerta's Soldiers.

Vera Cruz.—Sixty-three members of the Medina colony in the state of Oaxaca are among the refugees who have arrived here. They were held two days in Cordoba and report they were well treated, except that they were obliged to sleep on the floors of the barracks. They were relieved of guns, but not of the scanty belongings which they were able to bring with them.

J. W. Elliott, a locomotive engineer, was in Tierra Blanca when news of the occupation of Vera Cruz reached him. With his wife and children he started for Cordoba under guard of Mexican soldiers. At Cordoba the guards said they were hungry and demanded 50 pesos on the threat to surrender Elliott and his family to a howling mob which surrounded the station and filled the streets.

The money was paid and Elliott and his family were marched more than a mile through the streets to the barracks, hounded all the way by the mobs. They were kept in the barracks six days, during the first two of which crowds surrounded the place demanding their lives. On two occasions members of the mob forced their way into the barracks and except for the efforts of the colonel and two other officers Elliott and his family would undoubtedly have been killed. Toward the end of their stay the demonstrations ceased to a large extent.

Manager Boyd of the Motzorongo Hacienda, when he arrived at Cordoba, was forced by the federal guards to pay 1,050 pesos for protection through the streets to the jail.

Circulars containing the words "Kill the Gringoes" and urging the people to rise and massacre the prisoners were posted about Cordoba.

One of the refugees who have arrived here from the interior is F. W. Lehmer, a ranch manager from Tuxtepec, whose home is in Omaha and who was on his way to Vera Cruz for a visit, not knowing of the developments here. He was picked up at Tierra Blanca by federal soldiers.

"I was placed with ten others in a train which was standing overnight, surrounded by a mob which continually threatened to attack us," he said. "The guards ate up everything available on the train, compelling us to go hungry. At every station up to Cordoba, on the following day, similar crowds looted the train and threatened us.

"While being taken through the streets of Cordoba a squad of young volunteers who had just been presented with a flag swept down upon us and tried to run us down. This happened at the corner where the municipal palace is located or otherwise we would not have escaped as well as we did. As it was, I was hit on the head with a flagstaff and a man walking beside me was struck on the head with a rock. His scalp was badly cut.

"It was due to the fine conduct of the Mexican colonel that we ever reached the palace. He rushed from the door with a squad of police and soldiers and plunged into the crowd, scattering them and surrounding us.

"Later we were put in the penitentiary, and for six days we slept on the stone flagging. There were two women in the party, one with a little baby. We were allowed to send out and buy blankets, and managed to get enough to eat, such as it was.

"Monday we were placed on a train and brought down to Soledad. We spent that night on the tracks. There was one passenger coach left for us and in this the women and children slept, the rest of us sleeping on the ground."

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in a road house near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city and identifies the body. A young woman who accompanied Wrandall to the inn and subsequently disappeared, is suspected. Wrandall, it appears, had led a gay life and neglected his wife. Mrs. Wrandall starts back for New York in an auto during a blinding snow storm. On the way she meets a young woman in the road who proves to be the woman who killed Wrandall. Feeling that the girl had done her a service in ridding her of the man who though she loved him deeply, had caused her great sorrow. Mrs. Wrandall determines to shield her and takes her to her own home. Mrs. Wrandall hears the story of Hetty Castleton's life, except that portion that relates to Wrandall. This and the story of the tragedy she forbids the girl ever to tell. She offers Hetty a home, friendship and security from peril on account of the tragedy. Mrs. Sara Wrandall and Hetty attend the funeral of Challis Wrandall at the home of his parents. Sara Wrandall and Hetty return to New York after an absence of a year in Europe. Leslie Wrandall, brother of Challis, makes himself useful to Sara and becomes greatly interested in Hetty.

CHAPTER VI.—Continued.

Sara and Hetty did not stay long in town. The newspapers announced the return of Challis Wrandall's widow and reporters sought her out for interviews. The old interest was revived and columns were printed about the murder at Burton's inn, with sharp editorial comments on the failure of the police to clear up the mystery.

"I shall ask Leslie down for the week-end," said Sara, the third day after their arrival in the country. The house was huge and lonely, and time hung rather heavily despite the glorious uplift of spring.

Hetty looked up quickly from her book. A look of dismay flickered in her eyes for an instant and then gave way to the calmness that had come to dwell in their depths of late. Her lips parted in the sudden impulse to cry out against the plan, but she checked the words. For a moment her dark, questioning eyes studied the face of her benefactress; then, as if nothing had been revealed to her, she allowed her gaze to drift pensively out toward the sunset sea.

They were sitting on the broad verandah overlooking the sound. The dusk of evening was beginning to steal over the earth. She laid her book aside.

"Will you telephone in to him after dinner, Hetty?" went on Sara, after a long period of silence.

Again Hetty started. This time a look of actual pain flashed in her eyes.

"Would not a note by post be more certain to find him in the—" she began hurriedly.

"I dislike writing notes," said Sara calmly. "Of course, dear, if you feel that you'd rather not telephone him, I can—"

"I dare say I am finicky, Sara," apologized Hetty in quick contrition. "Of course he is your brother. I should remem—"

"My brother-in-law, dear," said Sara, a trifle too literally.

"He will come often to your house," went on Hetty rapidly. "I must make the best of it."

"He is your friend, Hetty. He admires you."

"I cannot see him through your eyes, Sara."

"But he is charming and agreeable, you'll admit," persisted the other.

"He is very kind, and he is devoted to you. I should like him for that."

"You have no cause for disliking him."

"I do not dislike him. I—I am—Oh, you always have been so thoughtful, so considerate, Sara, I can't understand your failing to see how hard it is for me to—to—well, to endure his open-hearted friendship."

Sara was silent for a moment. "You draw a pretty fine line, Hetty," she said gently.

Hetty flushed. "You mean that there is little to choose between wife and brother? That isn't quite fair. You know everything, he knows nothing. I wear a mask for him; you have seen into the very heart of me. It isn't the same."

Sara came over and stood beside the girl's chair. After a moment of indecision she laid her hand on Hetty's shoulder. The girl looked up, the ever-recurring question in her eyes.

"We haven't spoken of—of these things in many months, Hetty."

"Not since Mrs. Wrandall and Vivian came to Nice. I was upset—dreadfully upset then, Sara. I don't know how I managed to get through with it."

"But you managed it," pronounced Sara. Her fingers seemed to tighten suddenly on the girl's shoulder. "I think we were quite wonderful, both of us. It wasn't easy for me."

"Why did we come back to New York, Sara?" burst out Hetty, clasping her friend's hand as if suddenly spurred by terror. "We were happy over there. And free!"

"Listen, my dear," said Sara, a hard note growing in her voice: "this is my home. I do not love it, but I can see no reason for abandoning it. That is why we came back to New York."

Hetty pressed her friend's hand to her lips. "Forgive me," she cried impulsively. "I shouldn't have complained. It was detestable."

"Besides," went on Sara evenly, "you were quite free to remain on the other side. I left it to you."

"You gave me a week to decide," said Hetty in a hurried manner of speaking. "I—I took but twenty-four hours—less than that. Over night, you remember. I love you, Sara. I could not leave you. All that night I could feel you pulling at my heart strings, pulling me closer, and holding me. You were in your room, I in mine, and yet all the time you seemed to be bending over me in the darkness, urging me to stay with you and love you and be loved by you. It couldn't have been a dream."

"It was not a dream," said Sara, with a queer smile.

"You do love me?" tensely.

"I do love you," was the firm answer. Sara was staring across the water, her eyes big and as black as night itself. She seemed to be looking far beyond the misty lights that bobbled with nearby schooners, far beyond the yellow mass on the opposite shore where a town lay cradled in the shadows, far into the fast darkening sky that came up like a wall out of the east.

Hetty's fingers tightened in a warmer clasp. Unconsciously perhaps, Sara's grip on the girl's shoulder tightened also; unconsciously, for her thoughts were far away. The younger woman's pensive gaze rested on the peaceful waters below, taking in the slow approach of the fog that was soon to envelop the land. Neither spoke for many minutes: inscrutable thinkers, each a prey to thoughts that leaped backward to the beginning and took up the puzzle at its inception.

"I wonder—" began Hetty, her eyes narrowing with the intensity of thought. She did not complete the sentence.

Sara answered the unspoken question. "It will never be different from what it is now, unless you make it so."

Hetty started. "How could you have known what I was thinking?" she cried in wonder.

"It is what you are always thinking, my dear. You are always asking yourself when will I turn against you,"

"Sara!"

"Your own intelligence should supply the answer to all the questions you are asking of yourself. It is too late for me to turn against you." She abruptly removed her hand from Hetty's shoulder and walked to the edge of the veranda. For the first time, the English girl was conscious of pain. She drew her arm up and cringed. She pulled the light scarf about her bare shoulders.

The butler appeared in the doorway.

"The telephone, if you please, Miss Castleton. Mr. Leslie Wrandall is calling."

The girl stared. "For me, Watson?"

"Yes, miss."

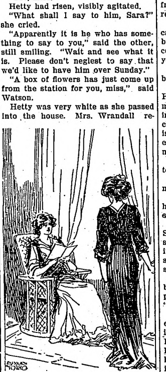
Hetty had risen, visibly agitated.

"What shall I say to him, Sara?" she cried.

"Apparently it is he who has something to say to you," said the other, still smiling. "Wait and see what it is. Please don't neglest to say that we'd like to have him over Sunday."

"A box of flowers has just come up from the station for you, miss," said Watson.

Hetty was very white as she passed into the house. Mrs. Wrandall resumed her contemplation of the fog-screened sound.



Hetty Looked Up Quickly From the Book.

"Shall I fetch you a wrap, ma'am?" asked Watson, hesitating.

"I am coming in, Watson. Open the box of flowers for Miss Castleton. Is there a fire in the library?"

"Yes, Mrs. Wrandall."

"Mr. Leslie will be out on Saturday. Tell Mrs. Conkling."

"The evening train, ma'am?"

"No. The eleven-thirty. He will be here for luncheon."

When Hetty hurried into the library a few minutes later, her manner was that of one considerably disturbed by something that has transpired almost on the moment. Her cheeks were flushed and her eyes were reflectors of a no uncertain distress of mind. Mrs. Wrandall was standing before the fireplace, an exquisite figure in the slinky black evening gown which she affected in these days. Her perfectly modelled neck and shoulders gleamed like pink marble in the reflected glow of the burning logs. She wore no jewelry, but there was a single white rose in her dark hair, where it had been placed by the whimsical Hetty an hour earlier as they left the dinner table.

"He is coming out on the eleven-thirty, Sara," said the girl nervously, "unless you will send the motor in for him. The body of his car is being changed and it's in the shop. He must have been jesting when he said he would pay for the petrol—I should have said gasoline."

Sara laughed. "You will know him better, my dear," she said. "Leslie is very light-hearted."

"He suggested bringing a friend," went on Hetty hurriedly. "A Mr. Booth, the portrait painter."

"I met him in Italy. He is charming. You will like him, too, Hetty." The emphasis did not escape notice.

"It seems that he is spending a fortnight in the village, this Mr. Booth, painting spring lambs for rest and recreation, Mr. Leslie says."

"Then he is at our very gates," said Sara, looking up suddenly.

"I wonder if he can be the man I saw yesterday at the bridge," mused Hetty. "Is he tall?"

"I really can't say. He's rather vague. It was six or seven years ago."

"It was left that Mr. Wrandall is to come out on the eleven-thirty," explained Hetty. "I thought you wouldn't like sending either of the motors in."

"And Mr. Booth?"

"We are to send for him after Mr. Wrandall arrives. He is stopping at the inn, wherever that may be."

"Poor fellow!" sighed Sara, with a grimace. "I am sure he will like us immensely if he has been stopping at the inn."

Hetty stood staring down at the blazing logs for a full minute before giving expression to the thought that troubled her.

"Sara," she said, meeting her friend's eyes with a steady light in her own, "why did Mr. Wrandall ask for me instead of you? It is you he is coming to visit, not me. It is your house. Why should—"

"My dear," said Sara glibly, "I am merely his sister-in-law. It wouldn't be necessary to ask me if he should come. He knows he is welcome."

"Then why should he feel called upon to—"

"Some men like to telephone, I suppose," said the other coolly.

"I wonder if you will ever understand how I feel about—about certain things, Sara,"

"What, for instance?"

"Well, his very evident interest in me," cried the girl hotly. "He sends me flowers—this is the second box this week—and he is so kind, so very friendly, Sara, that I can't bear it—I really can't."

Mrs. Wrandall stared at her. "You can't very well send him about his business," she said, "unless he becomes more than friendly. Now, can you?"

"But it seems so—so horrible, so beastly," groaned the girl.

Sara faced her squarely. "See here, Hetty," she said levelly, "we have made our bed, you and I. We must lie in it—together. If Leslie Wrandall chooses to fall in love with you, that is his affair, not ours. We must face every condition. In plain words, we must play the game."

"What could be more appalling than to have him fall in love with me?"

"The other way 'round would be more dramatic, I should say."

"Good God Sara!" cried the girl in horror. "How can you even speak of such a thing?"

"After all, why shouldn't—" began Sara, but stopped in the middle of her suggestion, with the result that it had its full effect without being uttered in so many cold-blooded words. The girl shuddered.

I wish, Sara, you would let me unburden myself completely to you," she pleaded, seizing her friend's hands. "You have forbidden me—"

Sara jerked her hands away. Her eyes flashed. "I do not want to hear it," she cried fiercely. "Never, never! Do you understand? It is your secret. I will not share it with you. I should hate you if I knew everything. As it is, I love you because you are a woman who suffered at the hand of one who made me suffer. There is nothing more to say. Don't bring up the subject again. I want to be your friend for ever, not your confidante. There is a distinction. You may be able to see how very marked it is in our case, Hetty. What one does not know, seldom hurts."

"But I want to justify myself—"

"It isn't necessary," cut in the other so peremptorily that the girl's eyes spread into a look of anger. Whereupon Sara Wrandall threw her arm about her and drew her down beside her in the chaise-lounge. "I didn't mean to be harsh," she cried. "We must not speak of the past, that's all. The future is not likely to hurt us, dear. Let us avoid the past."

"The future!" sighed the girl, staring blankly before her.

"To appreciate what it is to be," said the other, "you have but to think of what it might have been."

"I know," said Hetty, in a low voice. "And yet I sometimes wonder if—"

Sara interrupted. "You are paying me, dear, instead of the law," she said gently. "I am not a harsh creditor, am I?"

"My life belongs to you. I give it cheerfully, even gladly."

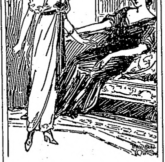
"So you have said before. Well, if it belongs to me, you might at least permit me to develop it as I would any other possession. I take it as an investment. It will probably fluctuate."

"Now you are jesting!"

"Perhaps," said Sara laconically.

The next morning Hetty set forth for her accustomed tramp over the roads that wound through the estate. Sara, the American, dawdled at home, resenting the chill spring drizzle that did not in the least discourage the Englishwoman.

She came to the bridge by the mill, long since deserted and now a thing of ruin and decay. A man in knickerbockers stood leaning against the rail, idly gazing down at the trickling stream below. The brier pipe that formed the circuit between hand and lips sent up soft blue coils to float away on the drizzle.



"Good God, Sara!" Cried the Girl in Horror.

She passed behind him, with a single furtive, curious glance at his handsome, undisturbed profile, and in that glance recognized him as the man she had seen the day before.

When she was a dozen rods away, the tall man turned his face from the stream and sent after her the long-restrained look. There was something akin to cautiousness in that look of his, as if he were afraid that she might turn her head suddenly and catch him at it. Something began stirring in his heart, the nameless something that awakens when least expected. He felt the subtle, sweet femininity of her as she passed. It lingered with him as he looked.

She turned the bend in the road a hundred yards away. For many minutes he studied the stream below without really seeing it. Then he straightened up, knocked the ashes from his pipe, and set off slowly in her wake, although he had been walking in quite the opposite direction when he came to the bridge—and on a mission of some consequence, too.

There was the chance that he would meet her coming back.

CHAPTER VII.

A Faithful Crayon-Point.

Leslie Wrandall came out on the eleven-thirty. Hetty was at the station with the motor, a sullen resentment in her heart, but a welcoming smile on her lips. The sun shone brightly. The sound glared with the white of reflected skies.

"I thought of catching the eight o'clock," he cried enthusiastically, as he dropped his bag beside the motor in order to reach over and shake hands with her. "That would have gotten me here hours earlier. The difficulty was that I didn't think of the eight o'clock until I awoke at nine."

"And then you had the additional task of thinking about breakfast," said Hetty, but without a trace of sarcasm in her manner.

"I never think of breakfast," said he amiably. "I merely eat it. Of course, it's a task to eat it sometimes, but—well, how are you? How do you like it out here?"

He was beside her on the broad seat, his face beaming, his gay little mustache pointing upward at the ends like oblique brown exclamation points, so expansive was his smile.

"I adore it," she replied, her own smile growing in response to his. It was impossible to resist the good nature of him. She could not dislike him, even though she dreaded him deep down in her heart. Her blood was hot and cold by turns when she was with him, as her mind opened and shut to thoughts pleasant and unpleasant with something of the regularity of a fish's gills in breathing.

"When I get to heaven I mean to have a place in the country the year round," he said conclusively.

"And if you don't get to heaven?"

"I suppose I'll take a furnished flat somewhere."

Sara was waiting for them at the bottom of the terrace as they drove up. He leaped out and kissed her hand.

"Much obliged," he murmured, with a slight twist of his head in the direction of Hetty, who was giving orders to the chauffeur.

"You're quite welcome," said Sara, with a smile of understanding. "She's lovely, isn't she?"

"Enchanting!" said he, almost too loudly.

Hetty walked up the long ascent ahead of them. She did not have to look back to know that they were watching her with unfaltering interest. She could feel their gaze.

"Absolutely adorable," he added, enlarging his estimate without really being aware that he voiced it.

Sara shot a look at his rapt face, and turned her own away to hide the queer little smile that flickered briefly and died away.

Hetty, pleading a sudden headache, declined to accompany them later on in the day when they set forth in the car to "pick up" Brandon Booth at the inn. They were to bring him over, bag and baggage, to stay till Tuesday.

"He will be wild to paint her," declared Leslie when they were out of sight around the bend in the road. He had waved his hat to Hetty just before the trees shut off their view of her. She was standing at the top of the steps beside one of the tall Italian vases.

"I've never seen such eyes," he exclaimed.

"She's a darling," said Sara and changed the subject, knowing full well that he would come back to it before long.

"I'm mad about her," he said simply, and then, for some unaccountable reason, gave over being loquacious and lapsed into a state of almost lugubrious quiet.

She glanced at his face, furtively at first, as if uncertain of his mood, then with a prolonged stare that was frankly curious and amused.

"Don't lose your head, Leslie," she said softly, almost purringly.

He started. "Oh, I say, Sara, I'm not likely to—"

"Stranger things have happened," she interrupted, with a shake of her head. "I can't afford to have you making love to her and getting tired of the game, as you always do, dear boy, just as soon as you find she's in love with you. She is too dear to be hurt in that way. You mustn't—"

"Good Lord!" he cried; "what a bounder you must take me for! Why, if I thought she'd— But nonsense! Let's talk about something else. Yourself, for instance."

She leaned back with a smile on her lips, but not in her eyes; and drew a long, deep breath. He was hard hit. That was what she wanted to know.

They found Booth at the inn. He was sitting on the old-fashioned porch, surrounded by bags and boys. As he climbed into the car after the bags, the boys grinned and jingled the coins in their pockets and ventured, almost in unison, the intelligence that they would all be there if he ever came back again. Big and little, they had transported his easel and canvasses from place to place for three weeks or more and his departure was to be regarded as a financial calamity.

Leslie, perhaps in the desire to be alone with his reflections, sat forward with the chauffeur, and paid little or no heed to the unhappy person's comments on the vile condition of all village thoroughfares, New York city included.

"And you painted those wretched little boys instead of the beautiful things that nature provides for us out here, Mr. Booth?" Sara was saying to the artist beside her.

"Of course I managed to get a bit of nature, even at that," said he, with a smile. "Boys are pretty close to earth, you know. To be perfectly honest, I did it in order to get away from the eminently beautiful but unnatural things I'm required to paint at home."

"I suppose we will see you at the Wrandall place this summer."

"I'm coming out to paint Leslie's sister in June, I believe. And that reminds me, I came upon an uncommonly pretty girl not far from your place the other day—and yesterday, as well—some one I've met before, unless I'm vastly mistaken. I wonder if you know your neighbors well enough—by sight, at least—to venture a good guess as to who I mean."

She appeared thoughtful.

"Oh, there are dozens of pretty girls in the neighborhood. Can't you remember where you met—" She stopped suddenly, a swift look of apprehension in her eyes.

He failed to note the look or the broken sentence. He was searching in his coat pocket for something. Selecting a letter from the middle of a small pocket, he held it out to her.

"I sketched this from memory. She posed all too briefly for me," he said.

On the back of the envelope was a remarkably good likeness of Hetty Castleton, done broadly, sketchily, with a crayon point, evidently drawn with haste while the impression was fresh, but long after she had passed out of range of his vision.

"I know her," said Sara quietly. "It's very clever, Mr. Booth."

"There is something hauntingly familiar about it," he went on, looking at the sketch with a frown of perplexity. "I've seen her somewhere, but for the life of me I can't place her. Perhaps in a crowded street, or the theater, or a railway train—just a fleeting glimpse, you know. But in any event I got a lasting impression. Queer things like that happen, don't you think so?"

Mrs. Wrandall leaned forward and spoke to Leslie. As he turned, she handed him the envelope, without comment.

"Great Scott!" he exclaimed.

"Mr. Booth is a mind reader," she explained. "He has been reading your thoughts, dear boy."

Booth understood, and grinned.

"You don't mean to say—" began the dumfounded Leslie, still staring at the sketch. "Upon my word, it's a wonderful likeness, old chap. I didn't know you'd ever met her."

"Met her?" cried Booth, an amiable conspirator. "I've never met her."

"See here, don't try anything like that on me. How could you do this if you've never seen—"

"He is a mind reader," cried Sara.

"Haven't you been thinking of her steadily for—well, we'll say ten minutes?" demanded Booth.

Leslie reddened. "Nonsense!"

"That's a mental telepathy sketch," said the artist, complacently.

"When did you do that?"

"This instant, you might say. See! Here is the crayon point. I always carry one around with me for just such—"

"All right," said Leslie blandly, at the same time putting the envelope in his own pocket; "we'll let it go at that. If you're so clever at mind pictures you can go to work and make another for yourself. I mean to keep this one."

"I say," began Booth, dismayed.

"One's thoughts are his own," said the happy possessor of the sketch. He turned his back on them.

Sara was contrite. "He will never give it up," she lamented.

"Is he really hard hit?" asked Booth in surprise.

"I wonder," mused Sara.

"Of course he's welcome to the sketch, confound him."

"Would you like to paint her?"

"Is this a commission?"

"Hardly. I know her, that's all. She is a very dear friend."

"My heart is set on painting some one else, Mrs. Wrandall."

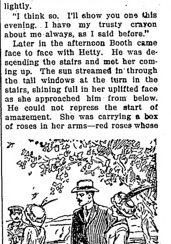
"Oh!"

"When I know you better I'll tell you who she is."

"Could you make a sketch of this other one from memory?" she asked lightly.

"I think so. I'll show you one this evening. I have my trusty crayon about me always, as I said before."

Later in the afternoon Booth came face to face with Hetty. He was descending the stairs and met her coming up. The sun streamed in through the tall windows at the turn in the stairs, shining full in her uplifted face as she approached him from below. He could not repress the start of amazement. She was carrying a box of roses in her arms—red roses whose stems protruded far beyond the end of the pasteboard box and reeked of a fragrant dampness.



"Enchanting!" Said He, Almost Too Loudly.

She gave him a shy, startled smile as she passed. He had stopped to make room for her on the turn. Somewhat dazed, he continued on his way down the steps, to suddenly remember with a twinge of dismay that he had not returned her polite smile, but had stared at her with most unblinking fervor. In no little shame and embarrassment he sent a swift glance over his shoulder. She was walking close to the banister rail on the floor above. As he glanced up their eyes met, for she too had turned to peer.

Leslie Wrandall was standing near the foot of the stairs. There was an eager, exalted look in his face that slowly gave way to well-assumed unconcern as his friend came upon him and grasped his arm.

THE SUNBEAM,

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3,1879

The Thief River Falls News-Press accuses Andrew Trovaton of being a political boss. We have known Trovaton for a large number of years, and he was always considered quite honest in politics, although he always did like to fill up that Missouri meerschaum of his, and roll out a string of political advice. We do not think that he will injure Knudsen any by supporting him, and if we were a candidate for any office in this county we would run the risk of all of that kind of injury that we could obtain. When Andrew gets out of wind talking English he again fills up the meerschaum, lights it, and starts in to spukka Norsk, and we want to tell you it counts. We know of a number of old men up this way, that wanted help to vote, and when they got into the booth, the first thing they said was; "Vare is Trovaton, ay vant to vote for Trovaton."

To publish all the political gush received at this office from candidates for state office week after week would require the installment of several linotype machines. Publishing literature "free gratis" doesn't go very far in buying pork chops for the average country printer.—Chisholm Mesaba Miner.

We don't have much trouble with this kind of stuff, in fact we are rather glad to get it, as they usually only write on one side of the sheet, and we use the other side for scratch paper, Send it along gentlemen.

O'Neill says he favors a Land Department for the State, What is making taxes so high now, is that there are too many State Departments being supported by the state. What the tax payers want, is a legislature pledged to economy, and to try and reduce that high rate of taxation instead of creating more useless commissions, who devote their time to talking politics to boom the state machine.

The Mexican war is remaining about the same, so far as this country is concerned, but it is likely to be a bad mix up before the end comes and peace is again established in that troubled country. Other nations have their war ships on the coast, and should any of them attempt to get mixed into what the United States consider their business, there might be a war started that would last a few years.

Candidate Jones of Bagley is making a strong campaign to save himself from elimination in June. As there are three candidates in the field, and one of them must be dropped out in June. Which one will it be? We are rather of the opinion at this time that the last man to enter the race will be the first to drop out, or be dropped out.

Now that C. L. Hanson, candidate for State Senator has pledged himself to vote for county option, we do not see where the temperance people who are supporting D. P. O'Neill have a peg to hang their hat on.

The position taken by speaker Champ Clark on the Panama Canal tolls bill, has disclosed the fact that it was very fortunate for the country and Democratic Party that Wilson instead of him was nominated and elected.

Our rate is $5.00 for a short political announcement. If you want to tell the people what you have been doing and expect to do in the future, 5 cents a line will be the rate to the June Primaries.

PUBLIC NOTICE,

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE BOARD OF ENGINEERS FOR RIVERS AND HARBORS,
Southern Building,
Washington, D. C.
May 1, 1914.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

The River and Harbor Act approved March 4, 1913, contained provision for a preliminary examination of "Red Lake, Minnesota, with a view to providing suitable harbor facilities at or near Redby, or at such other point or points on the lake as may be desirable." The required examination has been made by the District Officer, and his report thereon is favorable to the extent of recommending a survey and estimate of cost looking toward the construction of a harbor at Redby.

In accordance with law, the report has been referred to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors for consideration and recommendation. From the information presended, the Board is not convinced of the advisability of the United States undertaking any improvement at this locality for the following reasons:

(a) The improvement desired is mainly in the nature of a terminal facility, which is usually provided by local interests.

(b) The improvement would serve mainly the interests of the Red Lake Indian Reservation, and apparently should not be undertaken at the expense of the general public.

(c) The amount of commerce to be benefited is small, and the character of the ajacent country and the absence of any commercial or industrial enterprises indicate no very material increase.

(d) The probable cost of the improvement is considered large when compared with benefits to be expected.

All parties interested in the proposed improvement are invited to submit, within a period of thirty days from the date of this notice, statements and arguments bearing upon the necessity for the improvement in the interests of commerce and navigation. Such statements should be addressed to "The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, Southern Building, Washington, D. C." Should a hearing be desired, this can be arranged by correspondence with the Board.

THE BOARD OE ENGINEERS FOR RIVERS AND HARBORS,

The above means that there will be no improvements made by the government on this river. By a careful reading of the above, a man who has lived here for a number of years must conclude that the above report is O. K. The facts of the matter is, that Red Lake River is only a navigable river on paper, and has been so for the past five years, and it is now up to the people living along it to get it declared unnavigable, so they can get bridges across it.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

I respectfully solicit the support and vote of the electorate, men and women, of Pennington County at the approaching Primary Election, June 16th.

Respectfully submitted,

THE LOCAL NEWS

Get guaranteed clover and timothy seed at Ellingsons.

Inquire of Ellingson for timothy and clover seed.

The roads are reported to be in bad condition between here and Thief River Falls this week.

It seems to be a pretty hard matter to get anyone to do township road work this year.

C. L. Clark has taken the contract to finish the branch ditches and do the finishing of levelling the grade on ditch 53.

The Hyland brothers completed the well for E. A. Mostue this week, and are now drilling a deep well for W. E. Wilde.

The grass is starting to grow finely and the feeding of stock will soon end for at least six months.

Ellingson has a lot of guaranteed timothy and clover seed, which they are selling at reasonable prices.

While some of the farmers are getting uneasy over the late season, some of the politicians are more so over their chances of election to office.

Next will be corn planting time and the farmers may be able to get their corn planted in good season, if they are a little late with wheat sowing.

We have not yet heard who are to be the Socialist nominees for county office, but that party will undoubtedly have a full county and legislative ticket in the field.

Wilhelm Michelet has filed for the nomination and re-election for Judge of Probate. He has given very good satisfaction this term, and will undoubtedly be nominated and elected for four years more.

The new ferry at Highlanding is now in running order, and there has been a survey ordered of the road running south of Highlanding, so as to order it vacated four rods wide to the use of the public.

Read the public notice published in another column, and talk the matter over with your neighbors, and get ready to sign the petition which will soon be circulated, to be presented to Congress, asking them to pass an act declaring the Red Lake River an unnavigable stream.

The Northern Development Association will hold a meeting in Thief River Fall, June 3-4-5. Some very fine speakers will be there, and also vaudeville acts will be presented for the amusement of the people, during the time between the speeches. Do not fail to attend if you are a "booster" of Northern Minnesota And also bring the ladies along. If you do not attend this meeting you will miss something that is worth your while, time and money to hear.

It is very discouraging to try to get a public improvement, for the bennefit of the people, and have some fellow get up and fight it, just because he has got a little a little different idea from yours. They can usually put up opposition enough to kill the enterprise, then sit down and tickle themselves, because they won out, but never try to start anything themselves. We presume that there are people living in Deer Park and Highlanding that are just tickled to death because they beat the proposition to get a bridge across Red Lake River. They won out, alright, but just ask them where their bridge is located! Over in the town of Mayfield there is a lot of good fellows who fought a proposition to get a daily mail through their Town. They won out, but go over there and ask them what kind of mail service they got at this time, and they will tell you that they have a stub line twice a week, run for the benefit of the postmaster at Kratka.

We have not heard any complaint by the farmers about dust flying this spring.

The Highlanding Creamery Association has been compelled to bring some suits to obtain their rights.

Call and see us, when you are ready to make your final proof and we will make out your papers free of charge.

The weather has cleared up nicely now, and the prospects are that the farmers can finish their grain sowing without any farther interruptions.

For bad weather, this spring takes the head of the class of bad spring weather for the past ten years. Seeding is not half completed in this locality, and the ground is still unfit for doing spring's work, while we have frequent showesrs.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

To the Voters of the new 65th District, composed of the Counties of Pennington, Clearwater and Red Lake:

I hereby announce myself as a candidate for Representative for the said district. I solicit your support and votes at the primaries to be held June 16th, 1914.

I have been a resident of the District for the past thirty-two years and have I believe, growh to know the wants and needs of the citizens of the district, and as political platforms have been eliminated by the Non-Partisan Election Law, I therefore hold it to be the duty of all persons seeking legislative honors to declare themselves upon public questions affecting the welfare, health and morals of the people of the State.

If nominated and elected, I pledge myself to use my best efforts and ability to work for the following legislation:

Legislation for economy and efficiency in State Administration of business affairs for the purpose of lightening the burden of the present high taxes.

I favor putting the telephones of the state under the supervision of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission and compelling physical connection of lines and regulation of rates.

I shall encourage the adoption of the Revolving Fund Amendment, known as House File No. 1242. Also the Initiative Referendum Amendment.

Equal suffrage for women.

I favor the sale of foreign bonds held by the State of Minnesota, and the investment of the permanent funds of the State in improving our own state, instead of loaning them to other states at a low rate of interest. The money should be used to finance our Counties, Cities, Drainage Projects, School Districts and Loans on Resident Farm Property.

I favor the increase in the royalties paid the State when the present mineral leases expire.

I favor Consolidation and Reduction of the State Board Commissions in the interests of economy.

I favor the submission of the liquor question to the vote of the people, to the end that communities where they are of the opinion that right living and higher morals may be attained by the elimination of liquor, may at least have an opportunity of putting their views to the test.

I also favor liberal allowances for advertising the resources of the State with a view of reducing immigration.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of the condition in the rural communities.

Hoping you will give my platform due consideration and favor me with your franchise, I am most

Respectfully,
JOHN A. DUFFY.

FEELS LIKE A NEW WOMAN

As Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Dispelled Backache, Headaches and Dizziness.

Piqua, Ohio.—"I would be very ungrateful if I failed to give Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound the praise it deserves, for I have taken it at different times and it always relieved me when other medicines failed, and when I hear a woman complain I always recommend it. Last winter I was attacked with a severe case of organic weakness. I had backache, pains in my hips and over my kidneys, headache, dizziness, lassitude, had no energy, limbs ached and I was always tired. I was hardly able to do my housework. I had taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound on one other occasion, and it had helped me so I took it again and it has built me up, until now I feel like a new woman. You have my hearty consent to use my name and testimonial in any way and I hope it will benefit suffering women."—Mrs. ORPHA TURNER, 431 S. Wayne St., Piqua, Ohio.

Women who are suffering from those distressing ills peculiar to their sex should not doubt the ability of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to restore their health.

Tailor Learned in Unexpected Manner Just How He Looked to the Wholesale Firm.

Samson, a country tailor, visited a large wholesale warehouse in the city and ordered a quantity of goods. He was politely received and one of the principals showed him over the establishment. On reaching the fourth floor the customer saw a speaking tube on the wall, the first he had ever seen.

"What is that?" he asked.

"Oh, that is a speaking tube. It is a great convenience. We can talk with it to the clerks on the first floor without taking the trouble of going downstairs."

"Can they hear anything that you say through it?"

"Certainly."

The visitor put his mouth to the tube and asked:

"Are Samson's goods packed yet?"

The people in the office supposed it was the salesman who had asked the question and in a moment the distinct reply came back:

"No. We are waiting for a reply from his banker. He looks like a slippery customer."

The Change.

"In all his dealings with me, I have always found Smith white."

"He was, but now he's turning gray."

HAPPY NOW

Family of Twelve Drink Postum.

"It certainly has been a blessing in our home" writes a young lady in regard to Postum.

"I am one of a family of twelve, who, before using Postum, would make a healthy person uncomfortable by their complaining of headache, dizziness, sour stomach, etc., from drinking coffee.

"For years mother suffered from palpitation of the heart, sick headache and bad stomach and at times would be taken violently ill. About a year ago she quit coffee and began Postum.

"My brother was troubled with headache and dizziness all the time he drank coffee. All those troubles of my mother and brother have disappeared since Postum has taken the place of coffee.

"A sister was ill nearly all her life with headache and heart trouble, and about all she cared for was coffee and tea. The doctors told her she must leave them alone, as medicine did her no permanent good.

"She thought nothing would take the place of coffee until we induced her to try Postum. Now her troubles are all gone and she is a happy little woman enjoying life as people should."

Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum — must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

LAKE VESSEL AND CREW OF 20 LOST

BENJAMIN NOBLE REPORTED SUNK OFF DULUTH IN FIERCEST STORM OF YEARS.

PART OF WRECKAGE FOUND

Believed Evidence Has Been Discovered Which Establishes Enactment of Tragedy Beyond Doubt.

Duluth—Lake Superior, lashed to angry fury by one of the worst storms known, swallowed up the iron ore steamer Benjamin Noble, its officers and crew of twenty men, off Park point, almost at the mouth of Duluth harbor.

Cabin Is Located.

Tug captains looking for the wreck of the Noble located its cabin on a sand reef near Minnesota Point. They assert that this makes it certain that the crew was lost. No bodies have come ashore.

The storm, which lasted more than two days, is believed to have caught the steamer as it was beating its way to this harbor and to have ripped her apart.

Life belts, hatches, spars, rafts and oars were picked up with other wreckage and after vain efforts to locate the vessel the life savers at head of the lakes gave it up as lost and all on board.

Description of Vessel.

The Noble was a freight vessel owned by the Capital Transportation company of Detroit. John A. Francombe of Detroit is the manager and D. T. Helm & Co. of Duluth are the local agents. The personnel of the crew is not known to the local agents except the captain, John Eisinhardt, who is a new officer on the vessel.

The vessel had a capacity of 1,481 gross tons, was 239 feet in length with a 42-foot beam. It passed up the Soo April 25.

Storm Turns to Blizzard.

Modified, but still blowing a gale, the storm turned into a blizzard Wednesday, snow falling with occasional sleet.

Park point, the long and narrow strip of sand that forms the barrier between Lake Superior and St. Louis bay, was pounded by huge waves that threatened the destruction of many homes located there.

The Aerial bridge, the only means of communication between Park point and the main land, was unable to operate because the waves for the first time in its history washed over its floors. The wind also shook the bridge dangerously.

People Were Marooned.

People were marooned on either side. About 1,500 persons live on the point. On Wisconsin point the waves washed over in three places.

It was asserted by many that the storm was worse than that of Nov. 28, 1905, when the Mataafa and half a dozen other steamers were blown ashore and wrecked at this point.

Five Vessels Overdue.

Great anxiety is felt in Duluth for five vessels headed for this port. All of them are long overdue. These are the William H. Truesdale, Willis King, F. T. Heffelfinger, Sheldon Parks and David Z. Norton. No word has been received from them, although diligent search by wireless was made throughout last night and this forenoon.

Killed by Jumping from Train.

Alexandria.—The east-bound local of Great Northern No. 12 picked up the body of an unconscious man, lying at the side of the track, two miles west of this city. The man proved to be George Sexton, a bachelor of about 40 years of age residing alone in the locality of the accident. It was found that his skull had been fractured, the injury evidently having been inflicted in jumping from a freight train going west a few hours earlier. He died at a local hospital.

New Masonic Lodge Established.

Pelican Rapids.—A new Masonic lodge, known as the Otter Tail lodge, has been established here. Worshipful Master R. B. Strachan was assisted in the installation by Masons from Fergus Falls.

Sixty-five; Attempts Suicide.

Zumbrota.—Charles Hagadorn, aged 65, attempted to commit suicide by shooting himself in the ear with a revolver. He was despondent. He has a chance for recovery.

Winona Girl Alleged Swindler.

St. Paul.—Declaring that she had swindled him into paying personal bills for her amounting to more than $500, after going through a fake marriage ceremony, Henry G. Halloran swore to a warrant charging Margaret Fockenson, alias Marjorie French, of Winona, Minn., with swindling. The girl was arraigned in police court later and broke down when asked to plead to the charge. Halloran says he found the girl in St. Paul several months ago, the girl having come here following the death of her father.

JAS. MANAHAN A CANDIDATE FOR ATTORNEY GENERAL

Announcement of the candidacy of James Manahan, congressman-at-large for the Republican nomination for attorney general, was made by Mr. Manahan in Washington, and also in a telegram received by George S. Loftus of Minneapolis. Mr. Manahan will make his fight on a platform of anti-trust law enforcement.

JUDGE BOOTH IS HONORED

Name Goes to Senate as Successor to the Late Charles Willard on Federal Bench.

Minneapolis.—The name of Judge Wilbur F. Booth, as appointee of President Woodrow Wilson to the position of judge of the United States district court to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judge Charles A. Willard, was submitted in the United States senate for confirmation.

Judge Booth's nomination will no doubt be confirmed promptly, as there exists no reason why the senators should not accept him.

Judge Booth is 53 years old, and a bachelor. He was born in Seymour, Conn., Aug. 22, 1861. His parents, Rev. Albert Booth, a Methodist minister, and Mrs. Louisa T. Booth, aged 88, and 84 respectively, are living at Bridgeport, Conn.

Judge Booth entered Yale college in the fall of 1880 and was graduated in 1884, remaining two years for post graduate study. He entered Yale law school in 1886 and was graduated in 1888. While pursuing graduate studies and law studies he did private tutoring and teaching in the Hopkins grammar school in New Haven.

After being admitted to the bar in Connecticut in the fall of 1888 he came to Minnesota and was admitted to the bar in this state in 1889.

His appointment to the district bench of Hennepin county, May 20, 1909, by Governor John A. Johnson, was hailed with general approval by persons of all political affiliations. His conduct of official duties has won for him the greatest respect of bench and bar.

MIGHT HAVE SAVED VESSEL

Congressman Argues Breakwater in Duluth Harbor Possibly Would Have Prevented Disaster.

Duluth, May 2.—A breakwater of sufficient length and strength to afford protection to the Duluth harbor, would entail an expenditure of $4,000,000 and upwards, according to Congressman Clarence B. Miller, who arrived here from Washington.

Mr. Miller stated that he had been favorably impressed with the idea of a breakwater ever since the terrible record in the loss of life and property in a November storm in 1905 and he emphasized the belief that such a breakwater would have saved the Benjamin Noble, which has just been lost with a crew of twenty sailors aboard.

Marine interests seem to be divided on the proposition," said Mr. Miller.

Cream Law is Invalid.

Minneapolis.—Senator James Johnstone's "cream shipping" act was declared invalid by the state supreme court, which pronounced it an unreasonable interference with interstate commerce. This law provided that cream intended for buttermaking could not be shipped more than sixty-five miles by rail unless the cream had been pasteurized or was forwarded in refrigerator cars. Few, if any, statutes of Minnesota have been as productive of as much litigation in so brief a period of time as the Johnstone law has encountered.

Caledonia.—Dr. and Mrs. L. K. Onsgard of Houston township celebrated their silver wedding anniversary.

Block in Auditor Race.

St. Paul.—Julius H. Block of Duluth, once state treasurer of Minnesota and a candidate for governor, reentered the arena of state politics by filing for the republican nomination for state auditor. A three-cornered contest is on for that office in consequence, as Henry Rines of Mora and Insurance Commissioner J. A. O. Preus are candidates already. Mr. Block hailed originally from St. Peter, where he was sheriff several terms, and was elected state treasurer in 1900, serving three terms.

WAGE DEFINITE CHOLERA WAR

West Central Minnesota Lays Plans For a Thorough-Going Campaign.

Morris.—West central Minnesota is working its hog cholera campaign into definite shape, under the direction of F. E. Balmer, supervisor county agents, and M. E. Marrison, secretary of the West Central Minnesota Development association, which is financing the war.

The plan of warfare against the germs as developed at present is as follows:

First: The county agent, representing the University of Minnesota, the federal government, the Development association, and the people of his county, will be in active charge. He will be assisted by a committee of the county organization, by local sectional committees, by farmers' clubs, other organizations and individuals.

Second: A county wide hog census and survey will be made. From this it will be possible to know the number of hogs, their condition, whether or not they had cholera last year, or have it now, or are in an infected territory; whether hog owners intend to vaccinate their herds. This information will be filed with the county agent and reported to the association office.

Third: As soon as the facts have been gathered, veterinary service will be arranged for, and a flying relief squad organized; serum and virus bought in large quantities and at a low figure will be ready for distribution from county depots.

The procedure recommended is to vaccinate only in herds where cholera breaks out, or where herds are dangerously subject to infection. This will avoid the danger of the spread of cholera from double vaccination and when the system is working properly very few losses should occur.

ART GALLERIES FOR FAIR

Accommodations Will Be Made to House Exhibits Worth Hundreds of Thousands.

Hamline—Five new spacious art galleries for the accommodation of a quarter of a million dollars' worth of art subjects, are to be built at the Minnesota State Fair grounds this summer, to be ready for the coming fair, September 7-12, according to an announcement of Secretary J. C. Simpson. The Minnesota State Art Society is co-operating with the State Fair Management in the enterprise.

From now on, according to Maurice I. Flagg, director of the State Art Society, the annual state art exhibition will be held at the state fair grounds and it is expected to become one of the leading features of the fair. In the future hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of valuable art objects will be placed on exhibit at the Minnesota State Fair.

The galleries will be built directly east of the Woman's Building, and will have entrances and exits from that building. There will be nearly 10,000 feet of available wall space.

The exhibition, which is to be unequaled by anything ever attempted by any state fair in the United States, will be superior to any fine art exhibition held west of New York, with the possible exception of Chicago and St. Louis.

STATE FIRST IN CAMPAIGN

U. S. Health Service Gives Minnesota Board Credit for Pure Water Fight.

Washington.—Minnesota is one of the first states in the union to undertake thorough action to insure wholesome drinking water on passenger trains in the state, according to the United States public health service, which is publishing in its current report the results of an investigation by the Minnesota state board of health.

The state board has completed an investigation of the 61 sources of railroad water supplies in 60 localities, requiring nearly a year of work. Of the number 32 were condemned as unfit for consumption.

Notifications to the owners of the various sources, either municipal or railroad, has resulted in assurances that 28 of these 32 supply sources will be corrected in accordance with the board's recommendations. The other four will not be permitted to go without correction or discontinuance.

Doctors Dog; Dies at Result.

Luverne.—Harry Lear, 18 years old, died from lockjaw that following the treating of a sick dog by the boy a few days ago. The dog was subject to spasms and was frothing at the mouth when his young master attended him. A wound on the boy's hand became infected, it is believed.

Special Agent Drops In.

White Earth.—Charles W. Smith, special agent of the department of justice, has been here for a few days looking after agency matters in connection with Indian land litigation in which the department is concerned. John H. Simpson of Washington, who was appointed supervisor of scientific farming at this reservation last fall, resigned his position and departed for the capital city. Lewis W. Perry has been appointed chief farmer on the reservation.

HAYNES

We do not ask you to do our experimenting

During the twenty-one years in which we have been building motor cars, we have never asked the public to do our experimenting. Every unit of the Haynes car is designed, checked and thoroughly tested before receiving its final O. K.

The American Simms Dual High Tension Magneto is positively the most simple dual ignition ever devised. It was recommended by the Haynes engineers after careful speed and compression tests proved beyond doubt that it was unusually efficient and absolutely dependable.

The Leece-Neville Starting and Lighting Separate Unit System was chosen in 1910 because of its high efficiency and has been used on the Haynes car ever since, although numerous other starting and lighting systems have been tested in our laboratories from time to time. This system is dust-proof and has proven itself 100% efficient in every instance. There is no apparatus, however, on the

that has been subjected to a more severe test than the Vulcan Electric Gear Shift. This device is even a greater improvement than the starting and lighting system, because it not only simplifies the control but positively prevents stripping of gears.

While the electric gear shift is a great invention, it is not radically new, being just a natural development of the electro-magnet, which has been in use since 1820. The same principle is used by steel companies to lift tons and tons of metal; the electric railways adopted it long ago to shift switches automatically, and the little hammer that strikes the bell in your telephone is actuated by the impulse of a similar magnet.

The Haynes car is not an experiment. It represents the height of refinement, convenience and reliability in motor car design. It's the year-ahead car.

Biggest Rubber Tree of All.

What is believed to be the largest rubber tree in the world stands in the Brazilian territory of Acre, on the frontier of Boliva. Its stem is 27 feet 2 7-10 inches in circumference at the base. For 120 days every year this colossus gives 22 pounds of rubber a day. At present prices this brings in $2,160 a year, or a fair interest on about $50,000, to its owners, a family of seven Seringueiros.

35 BUSHELS PER ACRE
was the yield of WHEAT

160 ACRES FARMS IN WESTERN CANADA FREE

on many farms in Western Canada in 1913, some yields being reported as high as 50 bushels per acre. As high as 100 bushels were recorded in some districts for oats, 50 bushels for barley and from 10 to 20 bus. for flax.

J. Keys arrived in the country 5 years ago from Denmark with very little means. He homesteaded, worked hard, is now the owner of 320 acres of land, in 1913 had a crop of 200 acres, which will realize him about $4,000. His wheat weighed 68 lbs. to the bushel and averaged over 35 bushels to the acre.

Thousands of similar instances might be related of the homesteaders in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The crop of 1913 was an abundant one everywhere in Western Canada.

EASTER BY ANOTHER NAME

Farmer Didn't Understand It at First, But Light Finally Dawned on Him.

The lawyer from the city had a seat beside a farmer on the train, and wanting to be sociable he asked about this or that that had to do with farm life. Finally he queried:

"You don't make much of Easter out in the country, do you?"

"Well, no," was the answer.

"But you all have religions?"

"Yes, I guess so."

"The women in the city make a great ado about Easter."

"Um!"

"A good deal of money spent for new things."

There was silence for five minutes, and then the farmer said:

"You puzzled me a bit back there, but I've finally caught on."

"Puzzled you?"

"Yes. I kin see you got mixed up a bit."

"Just how, my friend?"

"Why, what you call Easter in town we call Ground Hog day out here, and at first I couldn't see why anyone should make a fuss over it, or where the religion came in. It's all right now, however. It's to sorter welcome the hog, and I'll be hanged if I blame you for it!"

Knew What He Meant.

The family doctor was paying a semi-social, semi-official call. Before taking his departure he lingered to discuss with the mother of his small patient local health conditions.

"We're not so badly off after all," he concluded. "For one thing, there are only two uncontrolled, unmitigated smoke nuisances in the whole town."

"I know," piped up small Margaret from her sofa. "You mean papa and Uncle Jim!"

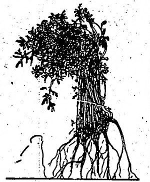
CULTURE OF ALFALFA CROP

If Hay Is Fed on Farm and Manure Returned to Soil Little Fertility Is Lost.

An alfalfa field will yield on an average 8,000 pounds of cured hay per acre in one season. This cured hay will contain about 6,880 pounds of dry matter. The number of pounds of each of the four most important ash constituents removed from an acre by a season's crop of alfalfa hay, as compared with clover hay, is as follows: Potash—alfalfa 206 lbs., clover 66; phosphates—alfalfa 58 lbs., clover 28; lime—alfalfa 89 lbs., clover 76; magnesia—alfalfa 22 lbs., clover 17.

Alfalfa draws most heavily on the lime and potash, resembling clover in this respect, but because of its heavier yield per season, a greater quantity of these ash constituents is removed. If the alfalfa is fed on the farm and the manure well preserved and returned to the land, but little fertility is lost. If it happens that the soils are poor in these constituents, fertilizers of lime in the form of land plaster and potash in the form of wood ashes can be profitably applied.



Two-Year-Old Alfalfa Plant.

With the aid of nitrogen gathering bacteria, alfalfa, like clover, can use the free nitrogen of the air, still it must not be inferred that a fair supply of nitrogen in the soil is unnecessary or that the application of nitrogenous fertilizers is always wasteful. Professor Dyer of England has shown by careful experiments that the "use of moderate quantities of nitrate of soda has been decidedly remunerative." He found that in five years, an annual dressing of 1 cwt. of nitrate of soda per acre gave an increase of nearly three tons of green alfalfa fodder per acre per year, while an annual dressing of 2 cwt. per acre gave an increase of four and a half tons of fodder per acre per year. From this he calculated that there was annual profit due to the nitrate of a little more than four dollars per acre in the first case and over six dollars per acre in the second case.

SANDY SOIL FOR ASPARAGUS

Item of Fertilizer Is One of Gigantic Importance—Plants Should Be One Year Old.

(By FRANK L. DAVIS.)

Asparagus requires a deep, sandy black loam soil, the deeper the better; subsoil of a porous nature and well tile-drained.

The item of fertilizer is one of gigantic importance. Fertilizer in some form must be procured in liberal quantities. Asparagus is not a dainty feeder; it devours alike the fine ground bone of commerce, and the dead cat picked up in the back alley.

In starting a family asparagus bed, plow the ground at least six inches deep. The plants should be one year old, set in rows three feet apart, and 18 inches apart in the row.

Dig the holes for the plants large enough to receive the roots in their natural position, and eight inches deep; firm the earth well over the plants.

Two hundred will supply a good-sized family all they can use. Cultivate and fertilize well for two years before cutting, and you will have plenty of good asparagus.

SCALP ITCHED AND BURNED

I had pimples on my scalp; my hair was falling out gradually until I had scarcely any hair on my head. I couldn't keep the dandruff off at all. Several years ago a tourist fell over the rock from a height of about three hundred feet, near Europa Point, Gibraltar. He was killed, of course. The lieutenant in charge of the guard room, however, inserted in his guard report for the day that "nothing unusual had occurred."

For this he was "carpeted" before the town mayor, who asked for an explanation.

"Well, sir," replied the young officer, a Scotchman, "if the puir mannie had na' been kilt it would have been a very extraordinary fact; but as the puir body was kilt—why, sir, I thought it was na' extraordinary or unusual."

THE SEVEN LEAGUE BOOTS

SUDDENLY THERE LEAPED UPON HIM A DREADFUL, SCREAMING THING THAT CAUGHT HIM BY THE THROAT WITH A GRIP OF STEEL

At one o'clock on the afternoon of April 14, 1918, a thousand newsboys ran racing through the streets of New York city, shouting at the top of their lungs and frantically waving "extras," wet from the press and smudgy with printer's ink, which were snatched up by all who could get near them. "All about the devil-chair!" they shouted. "The devil-chair runs up the cables of Brooklyn bridge!" "The devil eludes the police force of the five boroughs!" "The devil at large in New York state!" "'Shoot like a dog,' says Governor Smith!" "Extra! Extra! Ten cents, sir!"

The facts were these: About midday a crippled man in a strange wedge-shaped invalid's chair was seen by two policemen in that residential section of Brooklyn in which resided Mr. Frank Staples, the millionaire director of the Nokomis Land Development company and numerous other organizations. What seemed most curious to them was that the chair was balanced upon a single wheel, while from its interior there issued a faint buzzing sound, like that of a top humming at full speed. The cripple, having gained access to Mr. Staples' house, had forced him, at the revolver's mouth, to open his safe and hand him five thousand dollars in bills; he then made his way out of the house and limped into the chair, when he was arrested by the patrolmen, who had opportunely arrived upon the scene.

Then occurred the inexplicable feature of the performance. In the midst of a huge crowd, the cripple suddenly snatched the money out of the hand of one of the patrolmen, pressed a spring in the chair, and dashed away at the rate of a hundred and fifty miles an hour. He raced through Brooklyn, eluded the police force upon the Brooklyn bridge, and, traveling upon the single wheel, ran up the six-inch cables and down on the Manhattan side, and so made his way in safety into the northern part of New York state.

No wonder that this amazing vehicle became known as the devil-chair!

The mystery was solved about ten minutes after the first "extra" came from the press. Like all mysteries, it afforded a very simple explanation. The chair was fitted with a large gyroscope, that ingenious toy which has lately been found to possess remarkable qualities capable of being applied to traveling vehicles of all kinds. In brief, the gyroscope is simply a top which, when set spinning at any angle, retains the same plane of incidence and cannot be dislodged from it until the motive force runs down. Controlled by an ordinary gas engine, and affixed to the chair, the latter was enabled to run with perfect steadiness upon a single wheel, attaining the prodigious rate of two hundred miles an hour, while, so long as the gyroscope revolved, no mechanical force short of a trip-hammer could upset the vehicle, which could move on roads or sidewalks, or, with still greater facility, upon the single rails of train and trolley tracks, on stretched ropes, or even on telegraph wires, for the wheel was grooved for this special purpose.

Who was this crippled man who had contrived so wonderful a machine?

John Haynes was an Englishman forty years of age, and, five years before, in no wise differed from thousands of other Englishmen of good family and fair circumstances. Then the day came when he received a letter from a certain lawyer named Frank Staples, who was at that time just struggling out of want into affluence through dubious practices. Staples informed him that his uncle, one of the original settlers of Nokomis Falls, had died, leaving him sole heir to property in land, the value of which was estimated at $1,000,000. He offered to settle up the estate for that sum.

John Haynes sailed by the next steamship with his wife and daughter, surprised Staples in his office, and discovered that the value of the estate was not one but eleven millions of dollars. He threw Staples over and went west to fight his battle alone. That was the man's sterling honesty of nature and fighting quality. He would not compromise with crooks. He found that Staples had formed a company claiming the land under certain antiquated acts of the legislature. John Haynes refused five millions and began the biggest battle that the state had known.

It might have dragged on forever. It would certainly have ended in Haynes' victory. His enemies sent spies under the guise of friends, learned his strong points and his weak ones. They found, among other things, that he had an exaggerated idea of the customs prevalent in that unsettled portion of the community. A blackguard insulted his wife; his pretended friends told him, when the man came out of the hospital, that he would have to accept a challenge to fight a duel. Haynes innocently accepted the invitation, went out before daybreak, and met his adversary with a pistol from which the bullet had been secretly extracted. Both fired. John Haynes fell, crippled and paralyzed by a bullet in the spine. When he recovered consciousness he was lying in a city hospital under a different name and charged with murder.

His enemies, knowing the gigantic issues at stake, had played their last card upon the young Englishman's ignorance of American customs, and had won. Afraid to murder him when he lay bleeding and helpless upon the "field of honor," they had spirited him away to a city slum, dressed him in rags, and left him lying in an alley after a gang battle—also arranged with a dead man beside him. As Pete Timmons, a notorious gang leader, he was arraigned before a corrupt judge and sentenced to serve for fourteen years in the state penitentiary. Next day the case was discontinued; it was reported that Haynes had accepted a settlement and gone back to England; the conspirators came into possession of the land. John Haynes, in court, had reserved his defense, by the advice of his corrupt counsel, and only learned that sentence had been pronounced while he lay a helpless paralytic, in the jail hospital.

Every element in the state that should have been a force for justice was leagued against him. He never saw his wife or child again; he could learn nothing. He entered the penitentiary as Pete Timmons; when he persisted in his story he was placed in the insane ward. He learned to be silent; outwardly accepting his fate, he grew more bitter until the idea of revenge became his dominating motive.

At the end of his first year of imprisonment the first ray of hope broke in upon his soul. In the penitentiary he recognized a new face—that of a man named Ricardo, an American of Italian parentage, the blackguard with whom he had fought the mock duel that morning when he stole away from his wife and daughter to avenge the insult which had been offered to the former. Ricardo was serving a five years' sentence for burglary, which would be reduced, in practice, to about four. He made himself known to him. At first Ricardo, smarting under the failure of his confederates to save him, was inclined to listen to propositions for alliance; but when he discovered the indomintable honesty of the Englishman his mood changed. He heaped curses upon him whenever they passed and devoted his life to making the other's unbearable.

In particular he delighted in torturing Haynes about the fate of his family. That Ricardo knew where they were was clear to Haynes from certain statements which the Italian had let fall at the beginning of their association in the prison. In some way, then, Haynes must force Ricardo to tell the truth to him before he could begin to work out his revenge.

This was the man concerning whose exploits all America was now agape.

At first the idea of revenge had centered itself almost exclusively upon Ricardo. To Haynes this man embodied all the wrongs that he had endured. With that apparently unending fourteen years of imprisonment, always before him, he resolved to kill Ricardo; and, because he could not match the strength of his crippled body against the Italian's, he devoted his long hours of solitary imprisonment to developing the muscles of his right arm. Some day, he knew, he would come by stealth upon his adversary, grasp him by the throat and crush the life out of his body. Within a year he had acquired the arm and fingers of a Hercules.

But within that year new hopes had come to him. He realized, when the first fit of brooding had passed, that in Ricardo alone lay the hopes of discovering where his wife and daughter were. He must save him, not kill him; but he must place him at his mercy, so that he could wring the truth from the Italian's lying lips.

One day John Haynes came upon an article in an old magazine which gave him his first coherent plan of escape. It contained a description of a new scientific toy, known as a gyroscope, together with a diagram for its construction. Within a few days, under the plea of wishing to learn a trade, he had been transferred to the machine shop.

In the machine shop, as soon as he had familiarized himself with his surroundings and had become a part of the force, Haynes worked feverishly on his machine. He had torn out and secreted the pages of the magazine describing it, had pored over them at night in his cell, straining his eyes under the light of the electric globe over the entrance until he knew each word and every line of the diagram by heart. In the machine shop no very close watch was kept upon his movements. It was comparatively simple to secrete a bolt here and a nut there and to collect them later into a remote corner of the big building. As the men were searched only when they went out, and not during the day, nothing hindered him from carrying out his plans. He forged the iron in the intervals of hammering out bolts; he threaded the screws among a hundred others; and at last the day arrived when he had his machine all but completed and hidden in a heap of waste.

On the next day the waste was sold. Haynes found the shop empty, with nothing to show for his labors. He was forced to start over again. By the time his machine was again nearing completion the third year of his imprisonment was ended.

Then he was taken out of the machine shop and set to cobbling shoes. Again his hopes were dashed to the ground. In this manner the fourth year passed. The fifth was half completed when a change of management in the penitentiary enabled him to return to the machine shop. Doggedly he began his labors once more. This time he must succeed; for Ricardo would be set free in six months' time—Ricardo, whose venom against him had but increased during the years of his imprisonment, who never passed him but with jeers and curses.

When but two months longer of the Italian's time remained to be served the gyroscope was again completed and hidden away in the new pile of waste which had accumulated. Now there remained the more difficult part, the making of the gas engine and the application of the one to the other so that the motive power could be turned on or shut off at will. The gas engine in itself was a comparatively simple affair—in fact, at the last Haynes simply appropriated one from among the constituent parts of a powerful automobile which was being manufactured for an exhibition of convict labor. The attachment device racked Haynes' brains for several days. When but a month remained, more by accident than by design he hit on the solution.

And then remained the task of making an experimental test of the mechanism. This Haynes achieved by managing to secrete himself after the order to quit work had been shouted at nightfall. When the lights had been extinguished and the door closed upon the last convict, Haynes hastily assembled the constituent parts of the gyroscope, attached them to the gas engine, and, with the medium of a few ounces of gasoline, prepared to make the test. He bound the instrument to one of his crippled feet, hobbled to the farthest corner of the room and set off the ignition spark.

Two minutes later his absence was discovered by the guards who lined up the men to count them before returning them to their cells. There was no need to speculate as to the identity of the missing man. Pete Timmons' crippled form was always conspicuous among the prisoners—and besides, Ricardo was the first to shout his name. He was a trusty now and had the charge of assisting the warders. His hatred for the convict had grown until it surpassed every other emotion; now the thought that Haynes might have escaped goaded him to a fury of rage. Shouting wildly, he ran toward the door of the machine shop, broke it open and rushed inside accompanied by the guards. The lights were turned on and Haynes was found lying unconscious against a wall with concussion of the brain.

The test had been successful beyond his wildest hopes. No sooner had the gas engine come into operation than the gyroscope, whose motive power Haynes had ignorantly turned on to the full, attached as it was to his crippled feet, carried him across the machine shop with the speed of the wind. By a miracle of luck he escaped a collision with the machines and was dashed into the opposite wall, stunned by the impact. But for the interposition of some barrels, he would have been dashed to pieces.

By another miracle, the strap that bound the gyroscope to his feet broke under the strain. When Haynes was picked up the powerful machine lay hidden from sight under a heap of scrap into which it had plunged, and there it hummed, inaudible beneath the layers that concealed it, until it ran down from want of gasoline.

When, on his return to the machine shop, the prisoner found his machine among the debris, uninjured, the hope of freedom, hitherto but dimly imagined, suddenly became a burning reality. He had accomplished all but the last step. If he could once get free of those confining walls, his gyroscope with him, he knew that escape was certain. But inside he was qutie helpless. And only three weeks remained. He knew the day on which his enemy would be set free; and, if Ricardo preceded him into the world outside, his plans would be shattered probably forever.

Then came the unexpected stroke of luck which counterbalanced everything that had gone against him. Feigning that the accident had made him lose courage, Haynes had pleaded to be transferred to the shoe shop again, from which there was a desperate hope of obtaining access to the outer yard. But the prison doctor looked him over on the occasion of his last visit and noted the wasted body, the prison pallor and the cough which he had acquired from working among particles of steel.

"That man needs fresh air," he said. "Let him accompany the gangs at work on the new prison."

The edict was given out on a Friday morning. That afternoon Haynes set about taking the machine to pieces. By the time the shop was closed he had reduced it to its primitive condition of scrap metal. The searching of the men was more or less perfunctory and none of the guards suspected that "Pete Timmons" meditated escaping, for in spite of his evil record he had always proved himself to be a model prisoner. On the Saturday morning, Haynes contrived to stow away the remainder of the machine.

That afternoon, while he worked feverishly within his cell, Ricardo came merrily past, stopped and looked in. Haynes glanced up at him and stared in amazement. The man was resplendent in a new suit of blue serge; in his pockets were silver coins which he was jingling.

"Good-by, old friend," Ricardo called through the bars. "I go out under the new law today instead of Wednesday. I go to find your wife. See, I have letters from her all the time," he continued, patting his breast pocket. "Maybe you did not know. Yes, and then I find your daughter, la bella Eleanora. Maybe I like her better than your wife, and maybe not so well—time will show. We meet again, in nine years, is it not?" he ended reflectively. He stretched out his hand warily. "Good-by, old friend. Maybe you see me Monday, maybe not."

On Monday, Haynes carried a few fragments of his machine out of the prison, riding in the contractor's cart, beside which trudged the convicts and their guards. The breath of the fresh air, the blue sky, the freedom of the waste country, stunned him; at first he could not think.

Stretched out upon the rocks among the toiling men he ruminated bitterly. His hatred for Ricardo now almost transcended his longing for freedom.

A shadow fell across him. He looked up. Ricardo stood near in his new, suit, juggling his money.

"Good morning, dear friend," he murmured, warily keeping out of the way of Haynes' anticipated reach. "I came to tell you that I seen your daughter. She mighty fine girl, I tell you Pete. Soon, maybe, we go to Italy together."

Goaded by the wretch's lying words, Haynes struck at him wildly with his crutch. Ricardo merely leaped nimbly aside and mocked his impotent victim. A guard came running up.

"Hey! Beat it!" he shouted, leveling his rifle. "Beat it or I'll fill you with lead. God help me, I'll do that, if I catch you talking to my men again!"

Ricardo strode sullenly away, pausing only to wave his hand to his enemy.

By Friday Haynes had set up his machine in the hollows of the boulders. His heart was burning in his breast; he scarcely slept a moment thinking of Ricardo and of the need of wringing the truth from his lying lips. Twice since that Monday he had seen him in the distance, now bobbing up with a mocking salutation among the rocks, now waving to him from a hiding place among the trees. Why he took so keen a delight in disturbing him, Haynes did not know. He could not know that Ricardo had been commissioned by Haynes' enemies to keep in touch with him so long as he was outside the walls, and so less secure; on the other hand, neither could Ricardo know that, hidden in the rocks, complete even to the gasoline which the cripple had discovered in one of the contractor's carts, the terrible machine lay waiting to work upon its master's bidding. Nor that, on the following day, Haynes was to put his long cherished plan into effect.

He had planned it so perfectly, this first act in his revenge, that he could gloat over it, even to the minutest detail. Haynes had learned from observation, for instance, the times of the trains that passed the prison site; he knew them all, from the expresses to the locals, and had jotted down the hours and minutes upon the tablets of an almost perfect memory. And, since each day's delay was dangerous, and since the order for his return to his cell might be forthcoming at the week's end, he prayed with all his soul that Ricardo would be there on the Saturday.

He did return. He crept up under the shadow of the boulders under which Haynes was seated, fastening the gyroscope to one of his crippled feet. The Englishman had contrived this strap of his to a nicety. While it bound fast the gyroscope, it also passed over the other foot, fastening the two feet together, and thus converting him into a sort of statue. Haynes could balance himself without effort upon either foot, by reason of the peculiar nature of his paralysis, which, when he stood, pulled fast the tendons of either foot in exactly the manner of a fowl's muscles when it roosts, which fasten it to its perch without an effort. Haynes had everything completed at the exact moment when his divine luck brought Ricardo under the rock, not ten paces away. The guards were at the other end of the long line of men, and the Italian ventured nearer. A hundred paces away stretched the shining metals, and the north-bound express was already rumbling in the distance. It would rush northward on its way to Nokomis without stopping, and ten minutes later, would possibly have timed Ricardo's appearance more ingeniously.

"My friend," hissed the Italian from among the rocks, "I come to say good-by. I go away—maybe. She damn fine girl, Mees Eleanor, and she and me got marriage license yesterday and get married. Now she make damn fine bride. Good-by, friend Timmons. Tomorrow maybe we be en route for Italy—and maybe not. We think of you much. Maybe we pray for you. Maybe we come back in nine years more, and maybe not. Good-by, old Pete."

Goaded to desperation, though he knew there was not a fragment of truth in his enemy's taunting words, Haynes swung round his crutch and missed. Ricardo waved his hand mockingly and turning his back, started quickly back along the road. He knew that Haynes could never reach him. He did not even turn his head until it was pulled backward upon his shoulders. For suddenly there leaped upon him a dreadful, screaming thing that caught him by the throat with a grip of steel, beat him down, struck him, trampled on him; and, even as his screams grew fainter and the guards came running up, Ricardo felt himself borne off as by a whirlwind and hurtling through the air as in a nightmare.

Bullets were whistling over Haynes' head and he laughed loudly. It was delicious; this quaint fulfillment of the dream which he had cherished through five long years of agony, exactly as he had planned it; and the guards might just as well have fired at the sun, or at the rushing winds. For now Haynes was upon the metals and speeding far away in the wake of the north-bound express train that had come hurtling past, following it upon a single rail, holding up his enemy with ease with his strong right arm, while with the left he pounded him mechanically until the weak muscles tired.

And now he began to hear the roar of the approaching southward train upon the alternate track, and bending down as he ran, he half shut off the motive power, so that he moved comparatively slowly. He saw the train flash round the bend of the line, a dreadful thing, a smoking monster with a hiss of noisome breath and glowing eyes. Ricardo saw it and understood and uttered a wild scream of terror and prayer. And Haynes, holding him firmly with his mighty right arm, hissed into his ear:

"Where are they?"

A babbling cry issued from the Italian's foam-flecked lips:

"Ask Jack Poole at Grand Valley, northern New York."

Haynes hesitated one instant, and then, with a thrust of his arm, he pushed the Italian down the side of the embankment, away from the train as it swept past him. He ran on exultantly for miles, shouting deliriously in his happiness. Afterward, when the sense of self-preservation was renewed in him, he returned. He found the Italian lying in a crumpled heap at the bottom of the embankment, and after satisfying himself that his enemy was only stunned, he stripped him of his clothes and the few belongings he carried, left his own uniform beside the track, and set off at full speed along the metals eastward.

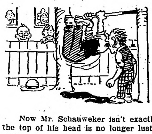
Mayor Shows Acrobatic Prowess Before Children

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—"Come on, pop, an' show us how to skin-the-cat."

"Sure, I'll show you how to skin-the-cat," quoth Joseph Schauweker, broker, who lives at 1847 Crawford road, a fashionable boulevard.



At 1851 Crawford road lives Newton D. Baker, mayor of the Sixth City, and in the rear of Mr. Baker's back lot are trapezes and other paraphernalia for skinning-the-cat and other youthful acrobatic stunts.

So the balmy air of Sunday morning, which had enticed Mr. Schauweker into the open, found him a few minutes later skinning-the-cat in the mayor's back lot for the edification of the respective younger generations of the Baker and Schauweker families.

Now Mr. Schauweker isn't exactly venerable, but what hair he owns on the top of his head is no longer lustrous. The sight of a dignified member of the stock exchange skinning-the-cat in the back yard was highly edifying to Mr. and Mrs. Baker. Besides, there's something about skinning-the-cat in the back yard on a balmy Sunday morning that is irresistible to anybody who has ever in his lifetime skinned-the-cat.

From enjoying the sight from one's window to taking a hand in the sport isn't such a wide step. It's both exhilarating and conducive to forgetfulness of the cares of office.

Mayor Baker joined Broker Schauweker. It was an hour later before Mayor Baker discovered their little pastime was being played to an audience of some two hundred or more residents of nearby apartments, whose porches and windows were lined with appreciative skin-the-cat fans, every last one of whom would have jumped at an invitation to join the sport.

"How 'r' y'u feeling 'smorning?" said Joseph Schauweker of 1847 Crawford road Monday morning.

"Three 'charley horses'—two lame arms," confessed Newton D. Baker of 1851 Crawford road.

Rat, Victor Over Cat, Is Killed by a Woman

CHICAGO.—A fight with a rat lasting for almost twenty minutes was the experience of Mrs. Della Pace of 2137 West Madison street the other morning. According to Mrs. Race's story, the battle was a fierce one.

The combat took place after the rat had gotten the best of a fight with a tomcat, which Mrs. Pace had borrowed from a neighbor. The cat was so badly bitten that it had to be killed.

Mrs. Pace first saw the rat when it ran across her bare feet, just after she had gotten out of bed. She says that the rat pursued her when she ran to the door, which she reached just in time to prevent it from biting her.

She then borrowed the cat from a neighbor. "Tom" gave a pleased yowl on seeing the rat, and leaped at it. The rat allowed the cat to chase it for about ten minutes, and then turned around and chased the cat with fully as much enthusiasm.

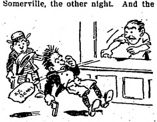
Finally Mrs. Pace heard sounds like the crying of a baby. Opening the door she saw the cat lying half dead on the floor, with the rat biting it. She went to the cat's rescue with a broom.

"Every time I'd hit it with the broom," said Mrs. Pace, "it would dash at me and try to nip my feet. But I'd jump in the air and the rat would go flying under me.

"Finally, after about twenty minutes of batting and jumping, I tired the rat out. I then killed it with the broom handle."

Bean Bag Foils Two Youthful Robbers in Boston

BOSTON.—Bean bags proved more fearsome weapons than revolvers in an attempted hold-up at the store of Fred B. Poole at 358 Beacon street, Somerville, the other night. And the bags held genuine Boston beans.



A lusty heave of a bag at the head of one of the two boys with leveled revolvers put both to ignominious flight. As they departed they fired several shots, but no bullet holes were found in the woodwork and there is a suspicion that blank cartridges were used.

According to Poole's statement to the police, shortly before ten o'clock two boys entered his grocery store. Closing the door carefully behind them, one passed over a dime to Poole, asking for a yeast cake. Poole turned to get one from the ice box and was brought up short with a command, emitted rather tremulously, to throw up his hands.

Poole wheeled around and found himself staring into two revolvers. He threw his hands forward instead of up and closed over a bag of beans. He hurled this at the head of the nearest boy, who dodged and, losing his nerve, backed toward the door. His companion followed, while Poole looked for another bag of beans.

Hard to Tell Where They'll Mix, But They Will

NEW YORK.—Dr. Cook is loose again, and heading in the general direction of the North pole. All towns north of Haworth, N. J., have been warned to keep a sharp lookout for Doc, who is exceeding the speed limit.

Running with the Doc is Peter, the tame rabbit of Haworth, three jumps to the rear and going strong.

Dr. Cook is a cat owned by Frank Knapp, which was last seen after taking a flying leap from the sheltering branches of a tree which it had climbed to escape Peter.

According to the people of Haworth, Peter is the fightingest rabbit ever known. He is owned by Rev. Dr. Jones, but has not absorbed any religious atmosphere to speak of.

Any day in which he doesn't lick a couple of dogs is wasted to Peter. He became courageous the other day and attacked William Gilley, who is near-sighted. Gilley thought Peter was his dog until he saw the battle light in the rabbit's eye. He fled.

Peter wrinkled his hare lips into a grin, and approached Dr. Cook, who was watching the sport. Doc elevated his tail and cut into the wind. Peter gained on him, and Doc climbed a tree.

Peter leaped for the branch on which Doc was shivering, and almost made it. Frightened, the kitty jumped to the ground and burned the wind for the north.

When last seen they were making for the state line. Doc Cook had a slight lead, but Peter was breezing easily, and drawing closer.

LADY MACKENZIE ON WAY TO JUNGLE

Bound for East Africa, where she says she will shoot big game and attempt to record on phonographic cylinders the jargon of the natives and the chatter of large apes, Lady Grace MacKenzie left New York the other day. She was enthusiastic over the prospects of penetrating the jungle, and declared she would go where no white woman was ever before seen.

"In fact, I will go to far more remote and interesting parts of the jungle than did Mr. Roosevelt or 'Buffalo' Jones. I can shoot as well as either of them and I am as strong and hearty as any man you know."

Lady MacKenzie looked the part indeed. She is a large woman, well-proportioned, and has the carriage of one with self-confidence. She is about thirty years old, but despite her admitted courage, she retreated a few feet when asked her age.

When she left she carried a deal of luggage. However, she intends to buy most of her outfit in London and in Africa, before she enters the unexplored jungles. At Nairobi, she is having a boat equipped now for the expedition. There she will put off her female attire and dress in a costume appropriate for the undertaking. She would not describe the costume, other than to say it would be difficult to distinguish her from the two white experts and guides who will be her personal attendants.

MADE CONVERTS WITH FISTS

"Tony" Biddle of Philadelphia, society pugilist and Bible class organizer, is back from a trip to Canada with his boxing gloves, snow shoes and a bundle of papers bearing the names of several Drexel-Biddle Bible classes enrolled in the land of the lumberjacks. Behind him Biddle left a stack of Bibles and three perfectly sound front teeth.

The Canadian lumber region had heard of Biddle and recently there came a call from one of the camps in the Northwest to see "the young dude who could box." Biddle packed his Bibles, his snowshoes and his boxing gloves and started north. As soon as he got over the United States border he found a wide impression that he was some sort of a "white hope."

As fast as he could issue invitations to join the Bible class, he received challenges to fight. He fought. The camps would pick out a husky and when a meeting organized the class would wait a few minutes while Biddle and the lumber pugilists "put on the gloves." After the fight Biddle preached a sermon on "athletic Christianity," his husky opponents listening at the improvised ringside.

WEALTHIEST PERSON IN GERMANY

When the German princes unanimously refused to contribute to a $250,000,000 war fund recently, Emperor William recognized that they were perfectly correct from a legal standpoint, but asked them individually to pay something to the fund, so that the people would not be enabled to say that the richest men in Germany—the princes—were the only ones exempt from paying anything for the safeguard of the country.

The German princes consented to that, out of patriotism, but now that they are called upon to perform the very act of putting their hands into their pockets they feel quite sad and reluctant. According to Rudolph Martin, an authority on German finance, the grand total of the wealth of German rulers and their families reaches the figure of $150,000,000, and should the present war tax on wealth be extended to the princes the German exchequer would reap some $1,500,000 on these fortunes. As the war tax is not intended in any event to yield more than the requisite $250,000,000, the princes' share in the tax would possibly relieve many poorer people from the obligation of paying anything at all.

The richest German prince is the kaiser himself, whose estate is valued at $35,000,000 and whose annual income is valued at $5,000,000. But the kaiser is by no means the richest person in the empire, or even in Prussia. He ranks fifth in the list of Germany's money magnates. The wealthiest person in the empire is Frau Bertha Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach, whose estate is valued at $70,000,000. Then comes Prince Henckel von Donnersmarck, with an estate valued at $60,000,000; Baron von Goldschmidt-Rothschild, $40,000,000; the duke of Ujest, $38,500,000, and the kaiser, $35,000,000.

HONEYMOON UPSETS OFFICIAL ROUTINE

Little did Mrs. Mark Thistlewaite, bride of Mark Thistlewaite, secretary to Vice-President Marshall, dream while on her honeymoon recently that she had upset the daily routine of the second officer of the great government of the United States.

But she did—the vice-president, secretaryless and messengerless, the last mentioned being stricken with the German measles while Mr. Thistlewaite was honeymooning, had to shift for himself. Not only that, but he could not find the vice-presidential date book. So every hour passed with the uneasy feeling that he was due somewhere or other to deliver a speech, or eat a luncheon or a dinner.

Official Washington took pity on the vice-president when his plight became known through the medium of the newspapers, and telephoned in reminding him of his engagements.

The first question the vice-president asked Mr. Thistlewaite, when beaming and smiling, he returned from his honeymoon, was: "Where's my date book?" He then congratulated the bonny bride, who is regarded as an interesting addition to the Hoosier colony in Washington.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Why Wooden Indians Are Rapidly Disappearing

WASHINGTON.—Not often is it now that one meets a wooden Indian on the streets of Washington. One more frequently meets the real Indian who has come from Oklahoma or Montana or some other far place to lodge a complaint at Washington against something or somebody. It was not very long ago that a wooden Indian, or a pair of wooden Indians, was as important to a tobacco store as red and green lights in a drug store window or a pole striped red and white or red, white and blue in front of a barber's.

I FIXED 'IM
TOBACCO TRUST

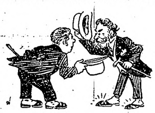
Times have not gone well with the wooden Indian, and about two years ago the writer made a census of them in Washington, and after canvassing all the principal streets from the river front to the boundary and from Foundry branch to the Eastern branch, he did not find enough to furnish fuel for a respectable council fire. They had become nearly extinct. They had not gone to happy hunting ground, but had been otherwise disposed of.

The owner of the big Indian which stood for uncounted years at the northwest corner of Ninth and D streets northwest told the writer that the tobacco trust slew the wooden Indian. At first it was believed by men who sold tobacco that a wooden Indian was a partner in the business, that he was a mascot and that without him no customers would enter. About the time that the various tobacco companies began to merge they set the fashion of huge lithographs, and these were of actresses and actors, and not of Indians.

Some of the new stores opened without setting up a wooden Indian. Then the police regulations began to interfere with wooden Indians who loitered on the sidewalk. They seemed to get on the nerves of the police. In the first place they obstructed the pavement. They held out bunches of wooden cigars as though they would halt passersby. They also carried knives and tomahawks.

They Are Called Alphonse and Gaston of Capital

SENATOR JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS of Illinois and Representative Andrew Jackson Montague of Virginia are the Alphonse and Gaston of congress. The Chesterfieldian manners of Lewis are well known through the middle West and the far West, where he formerly resided, but Montague is not so well known. He was formerly governor of Virginia, and Lewis is a native of that state, reared and schooled in Georgia, though later he attended the University of Virginia. Both, therefore, are Virginia gentlemen—whatever that may mean—and Virginia gentlemen, sah, do not fail to impress it upon their acquaintances that they are such. The impressions are made on the floors of the senate and house, as well as on the streets and other places.



The writer chanced to be standing at the curb one evening discussing in a very practical way with Senator Lewis the very practical question of who was going to win out in the fight for the internal revenue collectorship at Peoria, Ill., when Montague came along. The conversation ceased as Lewis and Montague recognized each other, both raising their hats and salaaming. Then for the mutual introduction and ten minutes of cross-fire of the amenities exchanged between the two Virginia gentlemen. It was beyond the pen or the brush of the cartoonist who made Alphonse and Gaston famous.

Was It Case of Flea Bites or Just Phlebitis

ONE of Senator William J. Stone's ailments during his recent illness was phlebitis. The senator's physician has been reticent concerning the details of the senator's ailments, and it was only after Senator Stone got out and to feeling like his old self that he personally made known what was the trouble with one of his legs, which is getting all right again. His physician had jocularly remarked that office-seeking constituents had been pulling the senator's leg too hard, and that was all that ailed it. The senator went to the capitol on crutches when he first got out, but in a day or two he was feeling much stronger and suffering practically no pain and was, therefore, able to joke about his afflictions. He made some inquiry about phlebitis, and a pension examiner in the pension bureau told a story of a veteran of the Civil war applying for a pension. The applicant wrote a personal letter to the commissioner of pensions, setting forth that he had been a sufferer from phlebitis and was entitled to a pension. The commissioner sent the case out to a rural examining board, in the county where the applicant resided, for investigation. In due time the report of the country doctor, chairman of the examining board, was received. It set forth that a thorough examination of the applicant substantiated the claim that he had been afflicted with phlebitis, "because his right leg is spotted with the markings left by flea bites."

GEE WHILIKINS! I MUST HAVE PHLEBITIS

Old Woman in Gallery Helped to Curb Acerbities

THE United States senate a few days ago tried to transact business while an old lady in the gallery knitted wool socks and cast a meditative eye upon the doings and sayings of the solons assembled on the floor.

The senate made little headway. It was self-conscious. Perhaps it had memories. Perhaps it had a feeling that it was undergoing a criticism much keener than that of the press gallery.

The old lady sat and knitted. When the debate waxed warm she laid by her yarn and needles and listened. When things quieted down she took up her task. After the senators discovered what sort of an eye they were working under they became more circumspect and more temperate in their words and action.

Most senators are yet old enough to recall the aunt or the grandmother that knitted and knitted, without any lessening of mental activity. Those who are that old, or that fortunate, know the ultimate of criticism, and calm judgment, and detective ability. The play of the knitting needle seems to give its manipulator a supernatural calm. It seems to give the small boy who faces it a physical and central qualm.

We would that the senate in the exercise of its constitutional right as a self-governing body might in a moment of virtue elect some dear old lady knitter extraordinary to sit and knit, and look, and with the flash of her needles and the calm sophistication of her eye soothe the heated brow of rhetoric and bring back the normal temperatures of health and of truth.

LARGEST WINTER WHEAT CROP

ONE-FIFTH AGAIN AS GREAT AS RECORD SET LAST YEAR.

630,000,000 Bushels Is Estimate Set Now From Present Prospects—Other Grains Estimated.

Washington, May 9.—The greatest crop of winter wheat ever grown, one-fifth again as large as the record crop grown last year and more than half again as large as that harvested in 1912, is indicated by statistics announced by the department of agriculture.

In all 630,000,000 bushels will be produced if the highly favorable conditions existing since the crop was planted last fall continue until harvest time. The acreage abandoned through unfavorable conditions of the winter amounted to only 3.1 per cent of the area planted, an unusually low area. This makes the area remaining to be harvested a record one of 35,387,000 acres.

Indications are that Kansas will have a crop of 132,000,000 bushels or 45,500,000 bushels more than last year and Oklahoma 35,500,000 or 17,000,000 more than last year.

Acreage remaining on May 1 to be harvested, condition on May 1 and estimated production in the surrounding states, follow:

States.	Acreage.	Condition.	Production
Illinois	2,576,000	97	47,500,000
Michigan	879,000	92	15,800,000
Wisconsin	85,000	89	1,600,000
Minnesota	41,000	89	700,000
Iowa	479,000	95	11,100,000
Missouri	2,549,000	99	44,200,000
S. Dak.	69,000	88	1,000,000
Kansas	7,950,000	96	132,000,000
Montana	481,000	96	12,900,000

Winter wheat, condition 95.59; area remaining to be harvested, 35,387,000 acres, or 1,119,000 acres less than planted last autumn, but 3,688,000 acres more than harvested last year.

Indicated yield per acre, 17.8 bus. Indicated production, 630,000,000 bus.

THE THAW CASE IS APPEALED

Supreme Court Must Proceed to Determine Legal Status of Fugitive.

Concord, N. H., May 11.—A bill of exceptions filed by counsel for New York state in the matter of the decision of Federal Judge Edgar Aldrich's decision granting the petition of Harry K. Thaw for a writ of habeas corpus was received and allowed by Judge Aldrich.

Counsel filed a bond covering the costs of the case to the supreme court of the United States which will determine Thaw's legal status.

Thaw was not in court, but was represented by Merrill Shurtleff, an attorney of Lancaster. William T. Jerome and Franklin K. Kennedy of New York and Bernard Jacobs of Lancaster appeared for New York state.

So far as is known here, Thaw will remain in Concord in custody of Sheriff Holman Drew of Coos county, pending the supreme court's decision.

Suffragists in Big Parade.

Washington, May 11.—With delegations from nearly every state in the union here, the women's suffrage procession and demonstration was held, between 5,000 and 10,000 suffragists marching from the White House to the capitol to demand the passage of the Bristow-Mondell resolution proposing a constitutional amendment giving women the right to vote.

Women Oppose Territorial Conquest.

Rome, May 9.—The American delegation of the International council of women, headed by Mrs. Kate Waller Barrett of Washington, adopted a resolution indorsing the statement of President Wilson at Mobile last October that "the United States never again will seek to obtain one additional foot of territory by conquest." It was decided to urge the American congress and the women of the United States to support President Wilson in this attitude.

SCORES KILLED IN ETNA EARTHQUAKE

135 KNOWN DEATHS AND MANY HUNDREDS INJURED IN SICILY.

PROPERTY LOSS ENORMOUS

Refugees Declare Catastrophe Is As Bad As Messina Disaster—Figures May Be Greatly Increased.

Catania, May 11. — An earthquake and volcanic eruption, followed by fire, destroyed many vilalges on the slopes of Mount Etna. The disaster caused the death of at least 135 persons. The number of injured is placed at 283. These figures probably will be greatly increased. Refugees declare that the property loss is as great as in the Messina disaster of 1908.

Devastation Is General.

Railroad tracks were torn up, churches razed, houses shaken to ruin and telegraph poles overturned over a radius of several miles around Catania. Terror-striken people rushed from the village into Catania, bringing stories of ruin and disaster. Their reports caused the authorities to take immediate steps to start measures of relief. The army, the navy and the civilian authorities received orders from Rome to render aid in the work of rescue. The aid of the Red Cross quickly was enlisted.

Interruption of railroad and telegraphs made it impossible to obtain any accurate details as to loss of life.

Shocks Felt For Days.

For several days past earthquake shocks had been felt at frequent intervals, accompanied by eruptions of Mount Etna. No particular attention, however, was paid to the occurrences, as the inhabitants of the district are accustomed to these agitations and the shocks were not exceptionally violent.

The center of the present terrible disturbance was at the village of Linera. Here the proportion of dead and injured was very heavy. The victims mostly were women and children. The property loss at Linera also was extremely heavy. The work of rescue was rendered difficult by the accumulation of debris.

Fire Adds Horrors.

According to the refugees fire in some places completed the work of destruction and hindered the work of rescuers.

Soldiers, firemen, sailors, priests and private individuals worked together in bringing succor. In many cases they found their way obstructed by broken bridges and ruined roads. In the village streets huge heaps of debris lay everywhere.

In the vilalge of Cosenti twenty bodies were recovered and at Santa Maria, six.

Acereale, a seaport town, is well built on a height at the base of Mount Etna, and every road leading to that city was almost choked with sobbing, praying refugees fleeing from their homes.

Linera, with a population of 952, and Venerina, a town of 2,183, were completely destroyed. Hundreds of houses were wrecked in the village of Zerbati, Pennisi, Belpasso, Maria, Vergine, Mangano and Zafferanao.

Wireless Heard 8,500 Miles.

San Francisco, Cal., May 9.—Officers of the Pacific Mail liner Mongolia, which is here from the Orient, announced that on the night of April 21 the ship's wireless operator had picked up a message from Boston, 8,500 miles away.

Eggs Pay Church Expenses.

Ravenwood, Mo., May 11.—How to make the hen pay the preacher and bear all other expenses of the church and never know it has been figured out by members of the Harmony church, five miles northwest of here. The project followed Sunday's egg collection at the Harmony church when the worshipers brought the Saturday product of their hens to church instead of the usual dimes and quarters. One hundred and sixty-eight dozen eggs went into the contribution boxes.

CONGRESS TO ADJOURN JULY 10

BOTH BODIES BENDING ENERGIES IN THIS DIRECTION.

Formal Call for Democratic Caucus Issued in House—Senate Meets Hour Earlier Daily.

Washington, May 11.—Plans for an early adjournment of congress took more definite shape when the senate advanced its meeting hour from noon to 11 o'clock and house leaders issued a formal call for a Democratic caucus Tuesday night, when a legislative program will be laid out which will include adjournment as a feature. If the senate holds to the 11 o'clock meeting hour and insists upon a few night sessions leaders believe that the hope of adjournment on July 10 may be realized. Majority Leader Underwood has no doubt that the house can finish its business before that date.

The house caucus Tuesday will consider a resolution announcing it to be the sense of the party that the anti-trust, interstate trade commission and railway capitalization bills, the rural credits measures and the appropriation bills should be passed and the house then adjourn. It is not expected that there will be any opposition to its adoption. The senate changed its meeting hour in order that it might hasten passage of the agricultural bill. This bill has dragged along for more than a week with little progress and several senators are anxious that it be disposed of before other appropriation bills are reported.

There was one cloud on the adjournment horizon when talk was renewed of an attempt to reach a vote at the present session on the proposed constitutional amendment for nation-wide prohibition. The resolution proposing the prohibition amendment will be taken up in the house under a special rule to be brought in within a week, so that action may be taken promptly. There is little likelihood that the amendment will be taken up in the Tuesday caucus, but there is no intention on the part of the house leaders to stifle it. Its passage requires a two-thirds vote and leaders expect the fight to be close.

No matter what the house does at this session with the prohibition resolution the senate has its hands so full of other subjects that it is not believed it will be taken up there for the present.

CANAL TO BE READY MAY 15

Panama, May 11.—Colonel George W. Goethals, governor of the Panama canal zone, says that he will put torpedo boats through the canal at any time Secretary of the Navy Daniels desires him to do so.

He said also that he would ask Secretary of War Garrison's approval to send ships through the canal on or about May 15, as he anticipated having a 30-foot channel cut through the slide at Cucaracha by then.

American Soldiers Executed?

Vera Cruz, May 11.—According to a report received here, Private Parks, orderly for Lieutenant Colonel Elmore Taggart, who disappeared inside of Mexican lines Thursday with two of Colonel Taggart's horses, was put to death by the Mexicans near Terra. This information, however, was not regarded as conclusive. A Mexican railroad man, the authority for the report, said he was told by one of Maas' soldiers, with whom he had a talk in the vicinity of the alleged execution, that Parks had been killed.

Airship Turns Turtle.

Utica, N. Y., May 11.—Percival Van Ness of this city, a licensed aviator, was killed here when his new biplane turned turtle.

Home Rule Compromise Opposed

London, May 8.—John Redmond, the Irish Nationalist leader, is understood to have opposed any negotiations for a compromise on home rule for Ireland until the bill reaches the house of lords. He had a long conference with Premier Asquith on the question of settlement and as a result of his opposition to negotiations the government agreed to hasten the final stages of the bill in the house of commons which will be completed week after next. The Irish home rule bill will thus become a law as it stands.

HUERTA RESENTS SEIZURE BY U. S. OF LOBOS ISLAND

LEADING MEDIATOR MAKES CALL AT WHITE HOUSE—CONSTRUED AS PROTEST VISIT.

AMERICAN REPRESENTATIVES TO PEACE COUNCIL CHOSEN

Men Selected to Meet With Arbitrators at Niagara Falls—Retired Soldiers Called Upon to Report as to Availability for Service.

Washington, May 12.—President Wilson received at the White House Ambassador Dagama of Brazil, the ranking member of the South American mediators, who are trying to compose the Mexican troubles.

Probably to Protest.

The receipt later of a dispatch from Mexico City stating that Foreign Minister Ruiz had protested to the mediators that several United States torpedo boats with a transport and tender had landed a party on Lobos island, eight miles off the coast, and taken the lighthouse, was believed to have been the purpose of the ambassador's visit to the White House.

The mediators had held a conference previous to the ambassador's call at the White House and this indicated developments of more than ordinary importance.

Nothing Made Public.

The navy department has not made public anything concerning the operation of vessels about Lobos island. Admiral Howard cabled to the navy department that Huerta had ordered the lighthouses on the Pacific coast extinguished, so as to impede navigation by American ships.

The same order by Huerta is reported to have been made to lighthouses on the Atlantic side, so that the reported seizure of the lighthouse on Lobos island might be held to be a precaution to keep the lights burning to protect all shipping.

As such a precautionary measure, the taking of the lighthouse, it is contended, would be without significance as an occupation or territorial acquisition of the island and therefore would not justify any charge of violation of armistice.

The Island of Lobos lies eight miles off the east coast and 180 miles north of Vera Cruz and 65 miles south of Tampico. Two islands are near together, Lobos and Blanquilleo.

To Represent U. S.

Associate Justice Joseph P. Lamar of the United States supreme court, and Frederick W. Lehman of St. Louis, formerly solicitor general, will be the representatives of the United States to confer with the mediators. This became known from an authoritative source. Justice Lamar had a long talk with the president, and later he and Mr. Lehman conferred.

The war and navy departments showed more than their wonted activity. Secretary Garrison and Major General Wotherspoon, chief of staff, were at their desks for several hours, conferring over the precautionary military movements now being matured. Except to say that no additional orders had been sent for troop movements, the officials were silent on their deliberations.

At the navy department much anxiety was felt over the reports that the German steamer Kron Prinzessin Cecilie actually had discharged her arms and ammunition at Puerto Mexico.

Retired Soldiers "Sounded."

The adjutant general's office of the war department has sent out an order to all retired enlisted men which includes non-commissioned officers to report their availability "in case of emergency" and many seasoned soldiers may thus be added to the active list. The order calls upon its recipients to report at once the duties previously performed with the grades held during active service.

Much apprehension is felt in diplomatic quarters as to the fate of foreigners at Mexico City in case a sudden revolt should overthrow Huerta and permit the entry of the lawless hordes of Zapata and other undisciplined rebel bands.

Word has reached some of the legations here of savage threats Zapata has sent from time to time to leading citizens and their wives and daughters in towns near where he was operating. One message is said to have notified a prominent citizen that when the town was captured Zapata would cut off his ears and "eat them fried." Another from Zapata to the daughter of a merchant is said to have informed her in revolting language to prepare to become his wife

The Duke of Connaught, governor-general of Canada, is taking steps to have suitable attention and courtesy extended to the South American mediators, and the delegates from the United States and Mexico, when they assemble at Niagara Falls, Ontario, on May 18.

Mrs. McAdoo in Bridal Gown, and Mr. McAdoo.

ELEANOR WILSON NOW MRS. M'ADOO

President's Youngest Daughter Married in White House.

CEREMONY IN BLUE ROOM

Wedding Gifts Are Many and Handsome—Description of the Bridal Gown, Going-Away Dress, and Other Costumes.

Washington, D. C., May 8.—The wedding of Miss Eleanor Randolph Wilson, youngest daughter of President Wilson, and William Gibbs McAdoo, secretary of the treasury, took place Thursday at six o'clock p. m., in the blue room of the White House.

The wedding procession proceeded from the main stairway into the corridor, through the north door of the blue room, to the platform erected in the south bay window of the room.

Miss Sallie McAdoo led the procession, followed by Mrs. Sayre and Miss Margaret Wilson. Miss Nancy Lane directly preceded the bride, who was escorted by the president. The groom, with Dr. Cary Travers Grayson, met the wedding party at the altar. Mr. McAdoo wore evening clothes and Dr. Grayson wore his uniform. Rev. Sylvester W. Beach performed the ceremony.

After the ceremony the wedding party proceeded to the red room, where they received congratulations and good wishes of the company. The Marine band furnished the music. Supper was served at small tables in the state dining room. The decorations of the blue room were lilies and ferns, and the decorations in the dining-room were pink and white roses.

Handsome Wedding Presents.

In spite of the small list of invited guests the wedding presents were numerous. Prominent among them were the beautiful silver tea service, given by the members of the house of representatives, a piece of jewelry from members of the senate, twelve silver plates and a platter from the cabinet members and their wives, and a handsome gift from the justices of the Supreme court. From the diplomatic corps, no member of which was invited, came flowers and good wishes.

The bride's bouquet was of orange blossoms, white orchids and lilies of the valley. The flower girls carried white chip hats, hung by ribbons, filled with flowers.

Miss Margaret Wilson's gown was of soft blue crape with panniers and waist of blue tulle. The neck was finished with a cream lace ruff and a flowered sash completed the costume. With this costume was worn a blue lace hat, trimmed with pink roses and touches of black. Mrs. Sayre's costume was exactly like Miss Wilson's except that the color was pink. The gowns of the little flower girls were white, with blue and pink ribbons.

Beautiful Wedding Gown.

The wedding gown worn by Miss Wilson is made of ivory-white satin and trimmed with real old point lace. The bodice is softly draped with satin, which crosses in front and is brought to a point below the shoulders, front and back. The V-shaped neck is finished with folds of soft tulle. The long mousquetaire sleeves are made of tulle. The real old point lace is gracefully draped over the right shoulder to the left side of the waist and is fastened with a spray of orange blossoms; the lace then continues as a border to the long transparent tunic of tulle, which graduates to the side of the skirt at the train. The sweeping train is three and a half yards in length.

A cap effect bridal wreath, with orange blossoms and long draped veil was very effective.

The old point lace used on the gown is a masterpiece and a work of art in lace making. It is a part of a would-famous collection.

Her Going-Away Dress.

The bride's going-away dress is a three-piece dress made of corbeau-blue gabardine. The coat is made of corbeau-blue charmeuse and gabardine. The front and upper part of back of coat is made of charmeuse. The back is gathered at collar. The three-quarter sleeve of gabardine is topped with the blue charmeuse, the edge of the sleeve being bound with a flat black silk braid. The soft girdle of gabardine ends in front with an oval charmeuse buckle. The bodice is dark blue chiffon over white. It has braided straps of gabardine over the shoulders, with 12 rows of braid over belt of blue gabardine. A white organdie vestee and collar are edged with a rose and green flowered narrow ribbon, fastened in front by three ribbon buttons. Long blue sleeves over white chiffon end in wide cuffs of 16 rows of narrow black braid.

The short skirt is of gabardine, with three circular flounces starting at sides of skirt. These are fastened at back with a strap of gabardine attached to which are four small black silk tassels. Between the flounces, corbeau charmeuse, to which they are attached, showing about one inch of charmeuse between each flounce. Flounces and bottom of skirt are edged with black silk braid.

Sketch of Mrs. McAdoo.

Mrs. McAdoo is the only one of the three daughters of the president who has evinced no inclination to pursue an accomplishment or perfect herself in any branch of study. Like her mother, she has talent as an artist in oils and has spent two seasons at the Academy of Fine Arts in Philadelphia. She has a keen sense of humor, and is much of a diplomat. She is the only member of the White House family who has a nickname. She is called "Nell."

In appearance, Mrs. McAdoo is tall, slender, with a girlish figure, and a light, swinging gait. She has a pleasant smile, fine teeth, a rather large mouth, blue eyes topped with dark brows and fringed with dark lashes, a fine clear white skin and quantities of soft, straight, dark hair. She rides, dances, swims and rows well and is quite a linguist. Her place in society as the wife of the secretary of the treasury will now be next to that of Mrs. Bryan.

Career of the Groom.

Mr. McAdoo was born in Georgia in 1863, of a family which had been wealth, but had lost their all in the Civil war. At twenty-one young McAdoo was admitted to the bar and five years later he came to New York. There he formed a partnership with William McAdoo, who was no known relation.

In 1885 Mr. McAdoo married Miss Sarah Fleming of Chattanooga, Tenn., who died four years ago. There are six children, Mr. McAdoo's principal residence is at Irvington-on-the-Hudson, not far from New York.

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in a road house near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city and identifies the body. A young woman who accompanied Wrandall to the inn and subsequently disappeared, is suspected. Mrs. Wrandall starts back for New York in an auto during a blinding snow storm. On the way she meets a young woman in the road who proves to be the woman who killed Wrandall. Feeling that the girl had done her a service in ridding her of the man who though she loved him deeply, had caused her great sorrow. Mrs. Wrandall determines to shield her and takes her to her own home. Mrs. Wrandall hears the story of Hetty Castleton's life, except that portion that relates to Wrandall. This and the story of the tragedy she forbids the girl ever to tell. She offers Hetty a home, friendship and security from peril on account of the tragedy. Mrs. Sara Wrandall and Hetty attend the funeral of Challis Wrandall at the home of his parents. Sara Wrandall and Hetty return to New York after an absence of a year in Europe. Leslie Wrandall, brother of Challis, makes himself useful to Sara and becomes greatly interested in Hetty. Sara sees in Leslie's infatuation possibility for revenge on the Wrandalls and reparation for the wrongs she suffered at the hands of Challis Wrandall by marrying his murderess into the family. Leslie, in company with his friend Brandon Booth, an artist, visits Sara at her country place. Leslie confesses to Sara that he is madly in love with Hetty.

CHAPTER VII.—Continued.

"I say, Leslie, is she staying here?" cried Booth, lowering his voice to an excited half-whisper.

"Who?" demanded Wrandall vacantly. His mind appeared to be elsewhere.

"Why, that's the girl I saw on the road— Wake up! The one on the envelope, you ass. Is she the one you were telling me about in the club—the Miss What's-Her-Name who—"

"Oh, you mean Miss Castleton. She's just gone upstairs. You must have met her on the steps."

"You know I did. So that is Miss Castleton."

"Ripping, isn't she? Didn't I tell you so?"

"She's beautiful. She is a type, just as you said, old man—a really wonderful type. I saw her yesterday—and the day before."

"I've been wondering how you managed to get a likeness of her on the back of an envelope," said Leslie sarcastically. "Must have had a good long look at her, my boy. It isn't a snap-shot, you know."

Booth flushed. "It is an impression, that's all. I drew it from memory, 'pon my soul."

"She'll be immensely gratified, I'm sure."

"For heaven's sake, Les, don't be such a fool as to show her the thing," cried Booth in consternation. "She'd never understand."

"Oh, you needn't worry. She has a fine sense of humor."

Booth didn't know whether to laugh or scowl. He compromised with himself by slipping his arm through that of his friend and saying heartily:

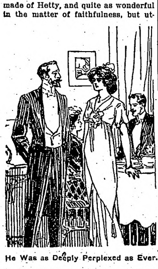
"I wish you the best of luck, old boy."

"Thanks," said Leslie drily.

CHAPTER VIII.

In Which Hetty Is Weighed.

Booth and Leslie returned to the city on Tuesday. The artist left behind him a "memory sketch" of Sara Wrandall, done in the solitude of his room long after the rest of the house was wrapped in slumber on the first night of his stay at Southlook. It was as sketchily drawn as the one he had made of Hetty, and quite as wonderful in the matter of faithfulness, but utterly without the subtle something that made the other notable. The craftiness of the artist was there, but the touch of inspiration was lacking.



He Was as Deeply Perplexed as Ever.

Sara was delighted. She was flattered, and made no pretense of disguising the fact.

The discussion which followed the exhibition of the sketch at luncheon, was very animated. It served to excite Leslie to such a degree that he brought forth from his pocket the treasured sketch of Hetty, for the purpose of comparison.

The girl who had been genuinely enthusiastic over the picture of Sara, and who had not been by way of knowing that the first sketch existed, was covered with confusion. Embarrassment and a shy sense of gratification were succeeded almost at once by a feeling of keen annoyance. The fact that the sketch was in Leslie's possession—and evidently a thing to be cherished—took away all the pleasure she may have experienced during the first few moments of interest.

Booth caught the angry flash in her eyes, preceding the flush and unaccountable pallor that followed almost immediately. He felt guilty, and at the same time deeply annoyed with Leslie. Later on he tried to explain, but the attempt was a lamentable failure. She laughed, not unkindly, in his face.

Leslie had refused to allow the sketch to leave his hand. If she could have gained possession of it, even for an instant, the thing would have been torn to bits. But it went back into his commodious pocketbook, and she was too proud to demand it of him.

She became oddly sensitive to Booth's persistent though inoffensive scrutiny as time wore on. More than once she had caught him looking at her with a fixedness that betrayed perplexity so plainly that she could not fail to recognize an underlying motive. He was vainly striving to refresh his memory; that was clear to her. There is no mistaking that look in a person's eyes. It cannot be disguised.

He was as deeply perplexed as ever when the time came for him to depart with Leslie. He asked her point blank on the last evening of his stay if they had ever met before, and she frankly confessed to a short memory for faces. It was not unlikely, she said, that he had seen her in London or in Paris, but she had not the faintest recollection of having seen him before their meeting in the road.

Urged by Sara, she had reluctantly consented to sit to him for a portrait during the month of June. He put the request in such terms that it did not sound like a proposition. It was not surprising that he should want her for a subject; in fact, he put it in such a way that she could not but feel that she would be doing him a great and enduring favor. She imposed but one condition: The picture was never to be exhibited. He met that, with bland magnanimity, by proffering the canvas to Mrs. Wrandall, as the subject's "next best friend," to "have and to hold so long as she might live," "free gratis," "with the artist's compliments," and so on and so forth, in airy good humor.

Leslie's aid had been solicited by both Sara and the painter in the final effort to overcome the girl's objections. He was rather bored about it, but added his voice to the general clamour. With half an eye one could see that he did not relish the idea of Hetty posing for days to the handsome, agreeable painter. Moreover, it meant that Booth, who could afford to gratify his own whims, would be obliged to spend a month or more in the neighborhood, so that he could devote himself almost entirely to the consummation of this particular undertaking. Moreover, it meant that Vivian's portrait was to be temporarily disregarded.

Sara Wrandall was quick to recognize the first symptoms of jealousy on the part of her brother-in-law. The new idol of the Wrandalls was in love, selfishly, insufferably in love as things went with all the Wrandalls. They hated selfishly, and so they loved. Her husband had been their king. But their king was dead, long live the king! Leslie had put on the family crown—a little jauntily, perhaps—cocked over the eye a bit, so to speak—but it was there just the same, annoyingly plain to view.

Sara had tried to like him. He had been her friend, the only one she could claim among them all. And yet, beneath his genial allegiance, she could detect the air of condescension, the bland attitude of a superior who defends another's cause for the reason that it gratifies Nero. She experienced a thrill of malicious joy in contemplating the fall of Nero. He would bring down his house about his head, and there would be no Rome to pay the fiddler.

* * * * * * * *

Brandon Booth took a small cottage on the upper road, half way between the village and the home of Sara Wrandall, and not far from the abhorred "back gate" that swung in the teeth of her connections by marriage. He set up his establishment in half a day and, being settled, betook himself off to dine with Sara and Hetty. All his household cares, like the world, rested snugly on the shoulders of an Atlas named Pat, than whom there was no more faithful servitor in all the earth, nor in the heavens, for that matter, if we are to accept his own estimate of himself. In any event, he was a treasure. Booth's house was always in order. Try as he would, he couldn't get it out of order. Pat's wife saw to that.

As he swung jauntily down the tree-lined road that led to Sara's portals, Booth was full of the joy of living.

Sara was at the bottom of the terrace, moving among the flower beds in the formal garden.

At the sound of his footsteps on the gravel, Sara looked up and instantly smiled her welcome.

"It is so nice to see you again," she said, giving him her hand.

"'My heart's in the highlands,'" he quoted, waving a vague tribute to the heavens. "And it's nice of you to see me," he added gracefully. Then he pointed up the terrace. "Isn't she a picture? 'Gad, it's lovely—the whole effect. That picture against the sky—"

He stopped short, and the sentence was never finished, although she waited for him to complete it before remarking:

"Her heart is not in the highlands."

"You mean—something's gone wrong—"

"Oh, no," she said, still smiling; "nothing like that. Her heart is in the lowlands. You would consider Washington square to be in the lowlands, wouldn't you?"

"Oh, I see," he said slowly. "You mean she's thinking of Leslie.'

"Who knows? It was a venture on my part, that's all. She may be thinking of you, Mr. Booth."

"Or some chap in old England, that's more like it," he retorted. "She can't be thinking of me, you know. No one ever thinks of me when I'm out of view. Out of sight, out of mind. No; she's thinking of something a long way off—or some one, if you choose to have it that way."

She smiled upon him with half-closed, shadowy eyes, and shook her head. Then she arose.

"Let us go in. Hetty is eager to see you again."

They started up the terrace. His face clouded.

"I have had a feeling all along that she'd rather not have this portrait painted, Mrs. Wrandall. A queer sort of feeling that she doesn't just like the idea of being put on canvas."

"Nonsense," she said, without looking at him.

Hetty met them at the top of the steps. The electric porch lights had just been turned on by the butler. The girl stood in the path of the light. Booth was never to forget the loveliness of her in that moment. He carried the image with him on the long walk home through the black night. (He declined Sara's offer to send him over in the car for the very reason that he wanted the half-hour of solitude in which to concentrate all the impressions she had made on his fancy.)

The three of them stood there for a few minutes, awaiting the butler's announcement. Sara's arm was about Hetty's shoulders. He was so taken up with the picture they presented that he scarcely heard their light chatter. They were types of loveliness so full of contrast that he marveled at the power of nature to create women in the same mold and yet to model so differently.

As they entered the vestibule, a servant came up with the word that Miss Castleton was wanted at the telephone, "long distance from New York."

The girl stopped in her tracks. Booth looked at her in mild surprise, a condition which gave way an instant later to perplexity. The look of annoyance in her eyes could not be disguised or mistaken.

"Ask him to call me up later, Watson," she said quietly.

"This is the third time he has called, Miss Castleton," said the man. "You were dressing, if you please, ma'am, the first time—"

"I will come," she interrupted sharply, with a curious glance at Sara, who for some reason avoided meeting Booth's gaze.

"Tell him we shall expect him on Friday," said Mrs. Wrandall.

"By George!" thought Booth, as she left them. "I wonder if it can be Leslie. If it is—well, he wouldn't be flattered if he could have seen the look in her eyes.

Later on, he had no trouble in gathering that it was Leslie Wrandall who called, but he was very much in the dark as to the meaning of that expressive look. He only knew that she was in the telephone room for ten minutes or longer, and that all trace of emotion was gone from her face when she rejoined them with a brief apology for keeping them waiting.

He left at ten-thirty, saying good night to them on the terrace. Sara walked to the steps with him.

"Don't you think her voice is lovely?" she asked. Hetty had sung for them.

"I dare say," he responded absently. "Give you my word, though, I wasn't thinking of her voice. She is lovely."

He walked home as if in a dream. The spell was on him.

Far in the night, he started up from the easy chair in which he had been smoking and dreaming and racking his brain by turns.

"By Jove!" he exclaimed aloud. "I remember! I've got it! And tomorrow I'll prove it."

Then he went to bed, with the storm from the sea pounding about the house, and slept serenely until Pat and Mary wondered whether he meant to get up at all.

"Pat," said he at breakfast, "I want you to go to the city this morning and fetch out all of the Studios you can find about the place. The old ones are in that Italian hall seat and the late ones are in the studio. Bring all of them."

"There's a divvil of a bunch of thim," said Pat ruefully.

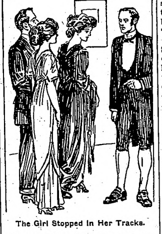
He was not to begin sketching the figure until the following day. After luncheon, however, he had an appointment to inspect Hetty's wardrobe, ostensibly for the purpose of picking out a gown for the picture. As a matter of fact, he had decided the point to his own satisfaction the night before. She should pose for him in the dainty white dress she had worn on that occasion.

While they were going over the extensive assortment of gowns, with Sara as the judge from whom there seemed to be no appeal, he casually inquired if she had ever posed before.

He watched her closely as he put the question. She was holding up a beautiful point lace creation for his inspection, and there was a pleading smile on her lips. It must have been her favorite gown. The smile faded away. The hand that dangled the garment before his eyes suddenly became motionless, as if paralyzed. In the next instant, she recovered herself, and, giving the lace a quick fillip that sent its odor of sachet leaping to his nostrils, responded with perfect composure.

"Isn't there a distinction between posing for an artist, and sitting for one's portrait?" she asked.

He was silent. The fact that he did not respond seemed to disturb her after a moment or two. She made the common mistake of pressing the question.



The Girl Stopped In Her Tracks.

"Why do you ask?" was her inquiry. When it was too late she wished she had not uttered the words. He had caught the somewhat anxious note in her voice.

"We always ask that, I think," he said. "It's a habit."

"Oh," she said doubtfully.

"And by the way, you haven't answered."

She was busy with the gown for a time. At last she looked him full in the face.

"That's true," she agreed; "I haven't answered, have I? No, Mr. Booth, I've never posed for a portrait. It is a new experience for me. You will have to contend with a great deal of stupidity on my part. But I shall try to be plastic."

He uttered a polite protest, and pursued the question no farther. Her answer had been so palpably evasive that it struck him as bald, even awkward.

Pat, disgruntled and irritable to the point of profanity—he was a privileged character and might have sworn if he felt like it without receiving notice—came shambling up the cottage walk late that afternoon, bearing two large, shoulder-sagging bundles. He had walked from the station—a matter of half a mile—and it was hot. His employer sat in the shady porch, viewing his approach.

The young man drew a chair up to the table and began the task of working out the puzzle that now seemed more or less near to solution. He had a pretty clear idea as to the period he wanted to investigate. To the best of his recollection, the Studios published three or four years back held the key. He selected the numbers and began to run through them. He was searching for a vaguely remembered article on one of the lesser-known English painters who had given great promise at the time it was published but who dropped completely out of notice soon afterward because of a mistaken notion of his own importance. If Booth's memory served him right, the fellow came a cropper, so to speak, in trying to ride rough shod over public opinion, and went to the dogs. He had been painting sensibly up to that time, but suddenly went in for the most violent style of impressionism. That was the end of him.

There had been reproductions of his principal canvases, with sketches and studies in charcoal. One of these pictures had made a lasting impression on Booth: The figure of a young woman in deep meditation standing in the shadow of a window casement from which she looked out upon the world apparently without a thought of it. A slender young woman in vague reds and browns, whose shadowy face was positively illuminated by a pair of wonderful blue eyes.

He came upon it at last. For a long time he sat there gazing at the face of Hetty Castleton, a look of half-wonder, half-triumph in his eyes. There could be no doubt as to the identity of the subject. The face was hers: the velvety, dreamy, soulful eyes that had haunted him for years, as he now believed. In no sense could the picture be described as a portrait. It was a study, deliberately arranged and deliberately posed for in the artist's studio. He was mystified. Why should she, the daughter of Colonel Castleton, the grand-niece of an earl, be engaged in posing for what evidently was meant to be a commercial product of this whilom artist?

Turning from a skilfully colored full page reproduction, he glanced at first casually over the dozen or more sketches and studies on the succeeding pages. Many of them represented studies of women's heads and figures, with little or no attempt to obtain a likeness. Some were half-draped, showing in a sketchy way the long graceful lines of the half-nude figure, of bare shoulders and breasts, of gauze-like fabrics that but illy concealed impressive charms. Suddenly his eyes narrowed and a sharp exclamation fell from his lips. He bent closer to the pages and studied the drawings with redoubled interest.

Then he whistled softly to himself, a token of simple amazement. The head of each of these remarkable studies suggested in outline the head and features of Hetty Castleton! She had been Hawkright's model!

* * * * * * * *

The next morning at ten he was at Southlook, arranging his easel and canvas in the north end of the long living room, where the light from the tall French windows afforded abundant and well-distributed light for the enterprise in hand. Hetty had not yet appeared. Sara, attired in a loose morning gown, was watching him from a comfortable chair in the corner, one shapely bare arm behind her head; the free hand was gracefully employed in managing a cigarette. He was conscious of the fact that her lazy, half-alert gaze was upon him all the time, although she pretended to be entirely indifferent to the preparations. Dimly he could see the faint smile of interest on her lips.

Hetty came in, calm, serene and lovelier than ever in the clear morning light. She was wearing the simple white gown he had chosen the day before. If she was conscious of the rather intense scrutiny he bestowed upon her as she gave him her hand in greeting, she did not appear to be in the least disturbed.

"You may go away, Sara," she said firmly. "I shall be too dreadfully self-conscious if you are looking on."

Booth looked at her rather sharply. Sara indolently abandoned her comfortable chair and left them alone in the room.

"Shall we try a few effects, Miss Castleton?" he inquired, after a period of constraint that had its effect on both of them.

"I am in your hands," she said simply.

He made suggestions. She fell into the position so easily, so naturally, so effectively, that he put aside all previous doubts and blurted out:

"You have posed before, Miss Castleton."

She smiled frankly. "But not for a really truly portrait," she said. "Such as this is to be."

He hesitated an instant. "I think I recall a canvas by Maurice Hawkright," he said, and at once experienced a curious sense of perturbation. It was not unlike fear.

Instead of betraying the confusion or surprise he expected, Miss Castleton merely raised her eyebrows inquiringly.

"What has that to do with me, Mr. Booth?" she asked.

He laughed awkwardly.

"Don't you know his work?" he inquired, with a slight twist of his lip.

"I may have seen his pictures," she replied, puckering her brow as if in reflection. "Oh," she cried, with a bright smile of understanding. "I see! Yes, I have a double—a really remarkable double. Have you never seen Hetty Glynn, the actress?"

"I am sure I have not," he said, taking a long breath. It was one of relief, he remembered afterward. "If she is so like you as all that, I couldn't have forgotten her."

"She is quite unknown, I believe she went on, ignoring the implied compliment. "A chorus girl, or something like that. They say she is wonderfully like me—or was, at least, a few years ago."

He was silent for a few minutes, studying her face and figure with the critical eye of the artist. As he turned to the canvas with his crayon point, he remarked, with an unmistakable note of relief in his voice:

"That explains everything. It must have been Hetty Glynn who posed for all those things of Hawkright's."

"I dare say," said she indifferently.

CHAPTER IX.

The Ghost at the Feast.

The next day he appeared bright and early with his copy of the Studio.

"There," he said, holding it before her eyes. She took it from his hand and stared long and earnestly at the reproduction.

"Do you think it like me?" she inquired innocently.

"Amazingly like you," he declared with conviction.

She turned the page. He was watching her closely. As she looked upon the sketches of the half-nude figure a warm blush covered her face and neck. She did not speak for a full minute, and he was positive that her fingers tightened their grasp on the magazine.

"The same model," he said quietly.

She nodded her head.

"Hetty Glynn, I am sure," she said, after a pause, without lifting her eyes. Her voice was low, the words not very distinct.

He drew a long breath, and she looked up quickly. What he saw in her honest blue eyes convicted her.

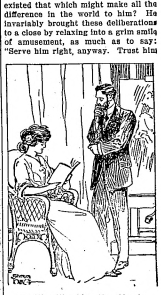
Sara Wrandall came into the room at that moment. Hetty hastily closed the magazine and held it behind her. Booth had intended to show the reproduction to Mrs. Wrandall, but the girl's behavior caused him to change his mind. He felt that he possessed a secret that could not be shared with Sara Wrandall, then or afterward. Moreover, he decided that he would not refer to the Hawkright pictures again unless the girl herself brought up the subject. All this flashed through his mind as he stepped forward to greet the newcomer.

When he turned again to Hetty, the magazine had disappeared. He never saw it afterward, and, what is more to the point, he never asked her to produce it.

He thought hard over the situation. The obvious solution came to him: She had been at one time reduced to the necessity of posing, a circumstance evidently known to but few and least of all to Sara Wrandall, from whom the girl plainly meant to keep the truth. This conviction distressed him, but not in the way that might have been expected. He had no scruples about sharing the secret or in keeping it inviolate; his real distress lay in the fear that Mrs. Wrandall might hear of all this from other and perhaps ungentle sources. As for her posing for Hawkright, it meant little or nothing to him. In his own experience, two girls of gentle birth had served as models for pictures of his own making, and he fully appreciated the exigencies that had driven them to it. One had posed in the "altogether." She was a girl of absolutely irreproachable character, who afterward married a chap he knew very well, and who was fully aware of that short phase in her life. That feature of the situation meant nothing to him. He was in no doubt concerning Hetty. She was what she appeared to be: A gentlewoman.

He admitted to himself that he was under the spell of her. It was not love, he was able to contend; but it was a mysterious appeal to something within him that had never revealed itself before. He couldn't quite explain what it was.

In his solitary hours at the cottage on the upper road, he was wont to take his friend Leslie Wrandall into consideration. As a friend, was it not his duty to go to him with his sordid little tale? Was it right to let Wrandall go on with his wooing when there existed that which might make all the difference in the world to him? He invariably brought these deliberations to a close by relaxing into a grim smile of amusement, as much as to say: "Serve him right, anyway. Trust him to sift her antecedents thoroughly. He's already done it, and he is quite satisfied with the result. Serve them all right, for that matter."



He Was Watching Her Closely.

But then there was Hetty Glynn. What of her? Hetty Glynn, real or mythical, was a disturbing factor in his deductions. If there was a real Hetty Glynn and she was Hetty Castleton's double, what then?

On the fifth day of a series of rather prolonged and tedious sittings, he was obliged to confine his work to an hour and a half in the forenoon. Mrs. Wrandall was having a few friends in for auction-bridge immediately after luncheon. She asked him to stay over and take a hand, but he declined. He did not play bridge.

GO TO THIEF RIVER FALLS

The Duluth Herald says:

By the way, the time draws near for the spring meeting of the Northern Minnesota Development association.

It will be held this time June 3, 4 and 5 at Thief River Falls, an admirable little community in the prairie country of Northwestern Minnesota which has long coveted the honor of being host to this association, which is planning to give it a good time, and which deserves a big attendance.

And the meeting itself will be worth while. It will be almost purely agricultural along chautauqua lines; and this in itself is a sign of progress and a proof of the achievements of the N.M.D.A.

When the association was born, the problem was to get settlers. The problem still is to get settlers but they are coming in rapidly; and there are enough of them in now so that the newer problems of how to handle the land when it is settled are to the fore. So there will be little agitation about settlement at this meeting, but much about development. The program is a good one, and full. Matters of great interest and importance will be discussed by experts, and the trip will be well worth while for everybody interested in the wooing of the soil.

Duluth should be there in force. Several Duluth speakers are on the program, and as usual Duluth and St. Louis county will have an important part in the doings.

Turn over the pages of your memorandum calender, and make a note that you have a date to be in Thief River Falls on June 3, 4 and 5.

Governor Eberhart was up to Bemidji two weeks ago and everlastingly "slung" the dope into that city about their Normal School. When he comes to Thief River Falls, he undoubtedly will keep his mouth shut on that subject, only when he gets a chance to talk privately with D. P. O'Neill, then they can have a private talk about how they threw the "mud hooks" into Thief River Falls on the Normal School proposition. You worked it fine gentlemen, and Bemidji is the place to brag about it, but don't come to this territory looking for votes.

There is now no avowed Socialist that has filed for either State Senator, or Representative from this District. So we guess that party will divide their votes among the other candidates at the primary election, and it is doubtful if they have any candidate this fall.

Two years ago Governor Eberhart said he would sign a county option law, if it passed the legislature. This year he is afraid to say as much for fear of loosing the support of his only loyal friends the "booze" sellers.

George M. Gunderson, candidate for county commissioner has got out a fancy set of campaign cards, but P. C. Wold will wipe them off on his overalls when the people get a chance to vote.

Judging by the loud noise in a saloon drinking crowd anyone would conclude that Eberhart was the only man running for governor.

Our rate is $5.00 for a short political announcement. If you want to tell the people what you have been doing and expect to do in the future, 5 cents a line will be the rate to the June Primaries.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

To the Voters of the new 65th District, composed of the Counties of Pennington, Clearwater and Red Lake:

I hereby announce myself as a candidate for Representative for the said district. I solicit your support and votes at the primaries to be held June 16th, 1914.

I have been a resident of the District for the past thirty-two years and have I believe, grown to know the wants and needs of the citizens of the district, and as political platforms have been eliminated by the Non-Partisan Election Law, I therefore hold it to be the duty of all persons seeking legislative honors to declare themselves upon public questions affecting the welfare, health and morals of the people of the State.

If nominated and elected, I pledge myself to use my best efforts and ability to work for the following legislation:

Legislation for economy and efficiency in State Administration of business affairs for the purpose of lightening the burden of the present high taxes.

I favor putting the telephones of the state under the supervision of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission and compelling physical connection of lines and regulation of rates.

I shall encourage the adoption of the Revolving Fund Amendment, known as House File No. 1242. Also the Initiative Referendum Amendment.

Equal suffrage for women.

I favor the sale of foreign bonds held by the State of Minnesota, and the investment of the permanent funds of the State in improving our own state, instead of loaning them to other states at a low rate of interest. The money should be used to finance our Counties, Cities, Drainage Projects, School Districts and Loans on Resident Farm Property.

I favor the increase in the royalties paid the State when the present mineral leases expire.

I favor Consolidation and Reduction of the State Board Commissions in the interests of economy.

I favor the submission of the liquor question to the vote of the people, to the end that communities where they are of the opinion that right living and higher morals may be attained by the elimination of liquor, may at least have an opportunity of putting their views to the test.

I also favor liberal allowances for advertising the resources of the State with a view of reducing immigration.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of the condition in the rural communities.

Hoping you will give my platform due consideration and favor me with your franchise, I am most

Respectfully,
JOHN A. DUFFY.

FOR COUNTY TREASURER.

I wish to announce that I am a candidate for the office of treasurer of Pennington county, and respectfully ask for your vote and support at the primary election to be held June 16th, 1914.

If nominated and elected, I shall use all my efforts, and to the extent of my ability render my services honestly and efficiently to the best interest of the people of Penningtn County.

Very Respectfully yours,
Theo. H. Liden.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

Appreciating keenly the honor and trust reposed in me in the discharge of my duties the past years, I hereby announce my candidacy for renomination for the office of Superintendent of Schools. I respectfully solicit the support and vote of the electorate, men and women, of Pennington County at the approaching Primary Election, June 16th.

Respectfully submitted,
E. A. Mostue.

Get guaranteed clover and timothy seed at Ellingsons.

Erie will celebrate July Fourth this year.

Inquire of Ellingson for timothy and clover seed.

J. Erickson and John Ofterdahl, of Thief River Falls were transacting business at Sunbeam last Saturday.

The weather has been very fine this week and the farmers have been rushing the seed into the ground.

Most all of the farmers are preparing to break up a lot more land this year, and men to do grubbing are in good demand.

Ellingson has a lot of guaranteed timothy and clover seed, which they are selling at reasonable prices.

We planted a small field of corn yesterday. While the weather seems rather cold a glance at the calender will convince you that it is time corn was in the ground, for it might better be nipped by frost in the spring than in the fall so as to save the labor of cultivating it through the summer.

Oscar Stenvick candidate for Representative was up this way extending the glad hand to the farmers Tuesday. He was accompanied by Rev. Roseland and the chairman of Lee's county committee of Pennington county. They made us a pleasant call out where we were marking corn ground.

County option is getting to be a leading issue again this year, and it looks now as if an option law would pass the next legislature, and if it does Pennington county will promptly take their place at the head of the column of dry territory, as a man will not be able to get a pint of whiskey for medicine in the county, and the alcohol jug will be something of the past, that will only be spoken of by old people, who can say that they remember when a man could go to Thief River Falls and buy alcohol by the gallon.

Local news are rather scarce this week, as ye editor is busy getting in his spring's crop. We had our plowing done last fall, but it has kept us busy getting our grain sown this spring, but when the primary elections begins to get warmed up old Hunt is likely to quit farming and take a seat on the type stool, If it gets too warm Ole Olson will write an article and if it get awful hot Sam Lessor will dig in.

Spider Racing.

Lord Devon's property was greatly impoverished by the twelfth earl, who squandered nearly all his fortune and terribly embarrassed the entailed property. He was addicted to a most peculiar form of gambling, namely, spider racing, which he played with the last Marquis of Hastings and the eighth Duke of Bedford. Each player selected a spider, which was placed on the table, and then the latter was gently heated from underneath. The warmth caused the insects to run, and the spider which got to the edge first won. But spiders are curious creatures, and it would frequently happen that a spider which was near the edge and looked like winning would double back, traverse the table in all directions and lose its backer the thousands of pounds so nearly won. Lord Devon, Lord Hastings and the Duke of Bedford each of them squandered enormous sums on this game, which contributed in no small degree to the ruin of the two former.—New York

Getting a "Thrill" in Formosa.

The traveler who is tired of conventional journeys and who is anxious to visit an "unspoilt" country where he can enjoy the comforts of civilization and at the same time taste some of the thrills and excitement attendant upon encounters with unsubdued savage tribes should certainly make a trip to Formosa, that wonderful island lying off the coast of China which passed into the possession of Japan in 1895.

Here, along the eastern coast, he will find prosperous towns, with fine harbors and wharves, spacious streets and magnificent residences, schools and churches, electric lights and ample water supply—all the luxuries, in fact, of a European city. He can journey comfortably by train from one place to another, passing through vast tea gardens and rice fields. Everything is civilized, orderly and safe. Yet only a few miles inland, among the mountains and forests, dwell fierce, unconquered tribes, whose chief aim and ambition in life is to gather human heads.—Wide World Magazine.

CAUSE AND EFFECT

Indigestion and the attendant discomforts of mind and body are certain to follow continued use of improper food.

Those who are still young and robust are likely to overlook the fact that, as dropping water will wear a stone away at last, so will the use of heavy, greasy, rich food, finally cause loss of appetite and indigestion.

Fortunately many are thoughtful enough to study themselves and note the principle of cause and effect in their daily food. A N. Y. young woman writes her experience thus:

"Sometime ago I had a lot of trouble from indigestion, caused by too rich food. I got so I was unable to digest scarcely anything, and medicines seemed useless.

"A friend advised me to try Grape-Nuts food, praising it highly and as a last resort, I tried it. I am thankful to say that Grape-Nuts not only relieved me of my trouble, but built me up and strengthened my digestive organs so that I can now eat anything I desire. But I stick to Grape-Nuts."

NORWAY'S RISE TO INDEPENDENCE

Why "Syttende Mai" Is Celebrated as Great National Holiday.

STORY OF EARLY STRUGGLES

Country Can Now Boast of the Highest Degree of Liberty Ever Enjoyed by Any Nation in the World.

As far back as reliable history carries us the countries of Denmark, Norway and Sweden have been inhabited by people of Germanic stock, with the exception of the extreme north, where Finns have lived as nomads from time immemorial.

Until about nine hundred years ago the people of the north spoke practically the same language, generally known as Old Norse. Before the year 800 they were divided between a number of petty kings. When King Harald Haarfagre (Fairhaired) united the various domains into one kingdom, in 872, it is said that he could boast that he had subdued 31 petty kings. Denmark became one kingdom under the powerful Gorm the Old, about the year 900. Almost at the same time large parts of the present Sweden were subdued by kings of the Ynglinga family.

In modern times the people of the North are generally called Scandinavians. This appellation is derived from the name of the southernmost portion of Sweden, now called Skane, which is sometimes Latinized into Scania or Scandia. An English linguist suggested "Scandian" for Scandinavian, but he has found few followers.

Attempts to Unite Countries.

For more than nine hundred years attempts have been made time and again to eliminate one or two of the three Scandinavian kingdoms. Their inhabitants are of the same stock, their languages are so much alike that they can easily understand each other and their religion is the same. The argument has been—why not unite under one government? But it is a fact that these kingdoms have never been more completely separated from and independent of each other than they are today.

Present King of Norway.

For a period of 434 years Norway was ruled by Danish monarchs residing in Copenhagen, and many were the Danes who predicted that in due time the two nations would be united. For another 91 years Norway was ruled by Swedish kings residing in Stockholm. But Norway, deprived of a ruler, a national government and a legislature of her own for 525 years, at this moment can boast of the highest degree of liberty ever enjoyed by a nation.

As early as the year 1030 Norway was in such a condition that King Knut (or Canute, as he is known in English history) the Great, of Denmark, sent his son, Svein, to rule over the Norwegians as their king. This was the beginning of a series of dynastic entanglements with Denmark which have continued until today. The present kings of Norway and Denmark are brothers.

The last male descendant of King Harald Haarfagre died in 1319. But a princess of that dynasty has married Duke Erik of Sweden, and their son, Magnus Eriksson, inherited the thrones of both Norway and Sweden. The two countries remained under the same ruler from 1319 until 1371.

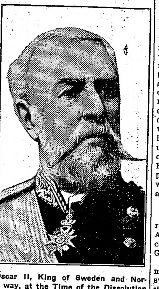
Scandinavian Countries United.

This brings us to the period when the three Scandinavian countries were united under one ruler. To enter into the details of this union would take too much space in a newspaper article. Suffice it to say that King Olaf of Denmark inherited the throne of Norway in 1380, and the union of Denmark and Norway is generally reckoned from this date, although it was not until 1450 that a formal agreement was made that the two countries should have the same king "for ever and ever."

King Olaf died in 1387. But the union was not severed, for his mother Queen Margreta, by far the greatest and ablest woman ruler who ever lived in Scandinavia. This woman has justly been called "The Semiramis of the North." Upon the death of King Olaf, at the age of seventeen, she managed to have her cousin, Erik of Pommern, a lad only six years old, made king of Denmark, Norway and Sweden. He was crowned at Kalmar, Sweden, in 1397. Hence the union of the countries of the North is known in history as the Kalmar union. This union has always been an inspiration to those who would like to see a united Scandinavia. About twelve years ago an attempt was made to erect a monument of Queen Margreta as a means of molding public opinion in favor of reviving the Scandinavian union. This plan was swept away, however, by the breaking up of the union of Sweden and Norway.

Kalmar Union Dissolved.

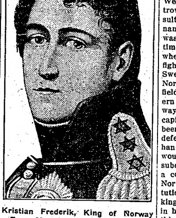
The Kalmar union experienced a checkered career. The Swedes broke away from it several times, but the final separation did not come until the time of the reformation. In 1520 King Kristian II was guilty of one of the most cruel deeds recorded in the annals of the North. After a successful war against his enemies in Sweden he had himself crowned king in Stockholm. He then had 82 of the leading men of the opposite party beheaded on the ground that they were "heretics," the pope having officially authorized the campaign of King Kristian. In the course of the next few days many other prominent Swedes in different parts of the country were killed in cold blood. This aroused the Swedes to a general uprising under the leadership of Gustaf Vasa, one of the ablest and noblest men known to the history of Sweden. After the most miraculous escapes he overcame the opposition and was made king of Sweden in 1523. This terminated the Danish rule in Sweden. The reign of Gustaf Vasa, from 1523 to 1560, marks the beginning of the golden age of Sweden.



Oscar II, King of Sweden and Norway, at the Time of the Dissolution of the Union of Norway and Sweden, 1905.

Passing over a period of nearly three hundred years we come to the time of the Napoleonic wars, in which all of northern Europe was involved.

In 1809 Sweden was forced to give up Finland to Russia. This was a great loss. A year later Jean Bernadotte, one of Napoleon's marshals, was made crown prince of Sweden, and changed his name to Karl Johan. The nominal king of Sweden, Karl XIII, was old and feeble, and Karl Johan soon became the real ruler of the country. Napoleon and he were never very fond of each other and in 1812 Karl Johan had a meeting with the czar of Russia, the arch enemy of Napoleon. At this conference, which was held in Abo, Finland, an agreement was made that Karl Johan, at the head of 30,000 Swedes, should join the enemies of Napoleon, after which Denmark should be compelled to cede Norway to Sweden. England, Austria and Prussia also agreed to this bargain.



Kristian Frederik, King of Norway From May 17, 1814, to October 10, 1814.

Norway Ceded to Sweden.

Napoleon was defeated in the great battle at Leipzig, in 1813, and Karl Johan followed up the agreement by turning against Denmark. By the treaty of Kiel, January, 1814, King Fredrik of Denmark ceded Norway to Sweden, but kept Iceland, Greenland and the Faroe islands, which had always belonged to Norway.

Napoleon was crushed. Denmark was eliminated as a military power. All of northern Europe endorsed the plan of having Norway ceded to Sweden. The Norwegians realized their position at once. The country had been impoverished by wars, and the failure of the crops in 1812 has no counterpart in the history of the country. Thousands upon thousands of Norwegians barely saved their lives by eating the inner bark of the Norway pine. The terrible news came in the gloom of the northern midwinter. It galled the people to be traded away like dumb beasts.

Norway Declares Independence.

Prominent Norwegians met at Eidsvold February 16 and agreed to call a national convention for the purpose of drafting a constitution for Norway. Sunday, February 25, was set aside as a day of prayer for the cause of independence, and the people were sworn to stake everything, even to sacrifice their lives, if need be. A constitutional convention was called at Eidsvold, which is located a few miles north of Kristiania. The meetings were held on the second floor of the main building of the iron works of that place. There were 112 men from all parts of the country. The different classes of people were equitably represented. The new constitution was drawn up May 17, 1814. On the same day Kristian August, a Danish prince who had held the position of "statholder" (regent) of Norway, was unanimously chosen king. On this occasion the chair was occupied by Prof. Georg Sverdrup, who was very prominent before and during the convention. After the election he made a speech in which he said:

"God Protect Old Norway!"

"Again we have raised the ancient royal throne of Norway, from which Adelstens and Sverres ruled the country with wisdom and vigor. May God protect old Norway!"

Two days later the king and the members of the convention were sworn to support the new constitution. They formed a chain of brotherhood by linking hands. While in this position they shouted.

"United and true until the Dovre mountains fall!"

The constitution adopted was an admirable document. Liberal use was made of the constitutions of the United States and of France. But so many features had to be changed and adapted to the peculiar circumstances that it was largely an original instrument.

Christian Michelsen, Premier of Norway, 1905, at the Time of the Dissolution of the Union of Sweden and Norway.

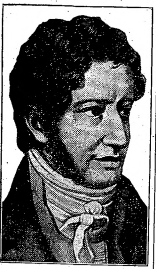
Sweden and Norway at War.

Norway was visited in June of the same year by representatives from the great powers of Europe, who demanded the deposition of the new king. No satisfactory agreements could be reached and war was the outcome. To speak of this war is almost impossible without offending either the Swedes or the Norwegians. We shall not try to settle this controversy, but hurry on to the final results. All parties agree on one point, namely, that the new Norwegian king was so afraid of blood spilling that time and again he ordered a retreat when his men were most eager for a fight. It is also agreed that the Swedes had about 40,000 men and the Norwegians about 20,000 men in the field. The Swedes entered southeastern Norway, and made some headway. The garrison at Fredrikstad fort capitulated before a single man had been wounded. Fort Fredriksten was defended with great pluck. Karl Johan began to suspect that the powers would be of little real help to him in subduing Norway, and so he offered a compromise to the effect that the Norwegians could keep their constitution if they would drop their new king and elect Karl XIII of Sweden in his place. King Kristian accepted this offer and opened the gates of Fort Fredriksten to the Swedes. The Norwegians were dismayed and Professor Sverdrup said to his king:

"The Norwegians complain not because they have shed too much, but because they have not shed enough blood."

The storting (legislature) convened in Kristiania, October 7, 1814. King Kristian Fredrik resigned and left Kristiania October 10. He lived rather quietly until he became King Kristian VIII of Denmark in 1839. Certain parts of the constitution were amended, and King Karl XIII of Sweden was elected king of Norway, November 4, 1814.

The kings of Norway and Sweden often found it difficult to satisfy both nations. The governments were supposed to be independent of each other. But the two countries were so closely connected that the actions of one government would be felt in the other. Consequently, there was a great deal of friction from time to time. In the early eighties matters grew much worse. The stortings amended the constitution so as to compel the members of the cabinet to appear in the storting and explain and defend its policy, if need be. The constitution provided that if three successive stortings passed a certain bill it should become a law without being ratified by the king. It did not say anything about amendments to the constitution itself. Now the storting claimed that the amendment was a part of the constitution, having been passed by three successive stortings, while the king maintained that he had an "absolute veto" with regard to amendments to the constitution. The whole nation was aroused. The storting was pitted squarely against the king and his Norwegian cabinet. The storting impeached the cabinet, and, after a trial that lasted more than six months, three members of the cabinet were fined $2,000 each, and the others were deposed. The king still tried to thwart the will of the storting, but the opposition was so determined that he had to yield.



Prof. Georg Sverdrup, Chairman of the Constitutional Convention at Eidsvold, May 17, 1814, When Kristian Frederik Was Chosen King of Norway.

Norwegian Cabinet Resigns.

At the beginning of this century the Norwegians made a demand which finally broke up the union of 1814. They wanted a separate consular service for Norway, chiefly in order to advance the particular commercial interests of Norway in foreign countries. Negotiations were carried on for years, but the king and the government of Sweden could never be induced to yield to the Norwegians on this point. Finally the Norwegian cabinet resigned.

Every sound-minded Norwegian felt that this was a most critical moment. Instinctively the leading men turned to the storting, which Johan Sverdrup, the ablest statesman that Norway produced in the nineteenth century, had called the "sheet anchor in the hour of danger." The storting held a secret session June 6, 1905, during which plans for the future were carefully laid.

The next day, the historic seventh of June, was bright and sunny. People began to gather around the storting building early in the morning. The doors were opened at 10:30 o'clock. Every seat was occupied. Solemn silence reigned. Every word could be heard and no words were wasted.

Dissolve Union With Sweden.

President Berner occupied the chair. Premier Christian Michelsen announced that the cabinet would assume the responsible task.

A resolution was passed to notify King Oscar II of what had happened and to ask him to see that a prince of his family be made king of Norway. After a few days the king declared that no prince of his family should occupy the throne of Norway.

Premier Michelsen was the moving spirit in this dangerous drama, and so resolutely did he act that the Swedes hardly realized what was going on until the union was past history.

To show how poorly the Swedes understood the temper of the Norwegians it must be mentioned that they asked for a popular vote on the question. A vote was taken in Norway August 13 and it was found that 184 votes had been cast in favor of the union and 368,208 against it.

Both countries sent thousands of soldiers to the boundary line ready for action on a few hours' notice. Meanwhile a joint committee met at Karlstad, Sweden, to settle the details of the dissolution of the union.

Norway abolished her nobility by an amendment to the constitution in 1821. The nobility of Sweden were anxious for war with Norway in 1905, but the king was opposed to bloodshed and a large majority of the common people of Sweden could see no reason for fighting the Norwegians.

Failing in its attempt to obtain a king from Sweden the storting proceeded to elect Prince Carl of Denmark. This was the last act in the drama which put Norway on the footing of absolute independence which she had not enjoyed since 1380.

STOP THAT BACKACHE

There's nothing more discouraging than a constant backache. You are lame when you awake. Pains pierce you when you bend or lift. It's hard to rest and next day it's the same old story.

Pain in the back is nature's warning of kidney ills. Neglect may pave the way to dropsy, gravel, or other serious kidney sickness.

Don't delay—begin using Doan's Kidney Pills—the remedy that has been curing backache and kidney trouble for over fifty years.

Must Have Pleased Whistler.

Richard A. Canfield, who has parted with his superb collection of Whistler paintings and pastels for $300,000, said the other day in New York:

"It would be a wise criticism to state my Whistler collection is the best in the world. And this reminds me of the unwisest criticism going—a criticism that a pretty English girl made to Whistler about my Whistler portrait of Count Robert de Montesquiou Fezensac.

"This pretty girl, gazing at the famous portrait with enthusiastic eyes, cried in a gushing voice:

"'Oh, Mr. Whistler, I do think your foreshortening of the skin tints is perfectly wonderful!'"

Good Description.

Wife—It was a nice party, you say, John. I'm sorry I couldn't go, but am really glad that you enjoyed yourself. How was Mrs. Gadabout dressed?

Husband—Well, she had on one of those dresses of what-you-call-it stuff, of a kind of a mixed shade and trimmed with what's-his-names. I don't remember now whether it was cut low or not, or whether it had sleeves, but I know it had one or the other. Her hair was done up the style like you see in the pictures—you know what I mean. I don't know whether she had any ornaments or not, but I expect she had. That's about all, I think, that I noticed about her, but you can easily tell from that how she looked.

NEW WAY OF LOOKING AT IT

Possibly Many of Us May Find Food for Reflection in Remark Made by Reverend Gentleman.

Perry S. Eustis, railroad passenger traffic manager, was complaining at the Traffic club dinner in Kansas City a few nights ago about the way the government pays the railroads for hauling the mails.

"I was a sweet, curly-haired child," he said. "I guess I had a sweet voice, too, for I sang in the choir of the Chestnut Hill Episcopalian church in Philadelphia. The rector, the Rev. J. Andrews Harris, always took the choir boys for a walk each Saturday, a privilege we greatly esteemed. On this particular Saturday my nose was out of joint because some one had been chosen to sing a solo the next day, and I was voicing my indignation.

"'As I understand it, your position is that you didn't get what you deserved,' said the rector.

"'Exactly,' I replied.

"'Then pray God you don't the rest of your life,' answered the Rev. Mr. Harris.'"—Kansas City Star.

ERUPTION ON CHILD'S BODY

R. F. D. No. 2, Jackson, Mo.—"Our daughter who is ten months old was suffering from an eruption all over the body. In the beginning they were small red spots and afterwards turned to bloody sores. She cried almost day and night and we scarcely could touch her, because she was covered with sores from head to foot.

"We had heard about the Cuticura Soap and Ointment and made a trial with them, and after using the remedies, that is to say, the Soap and the Ointment, only a few days passed and our child could sleep well and after one week she was totally well." (Signed) August F. Bartels, Nov. 25, 1912.

STATE BREVITIES

Little Falls.—The Morris Land company has been organized with offices in this city.

Little Falls.—Ludwig Sens, 85 years old, a native of Germany, is dead at his home here.

Winona.—Dr. R. C. Mason, widely known throughout Southern Minnesota as a veterinarian, dropped dead on the street here while on a professional call.

Sleepy Eye.—Sam Bellig of Leavenworth, died as the result of being kicked by a horse. He was about 35 years old and had a wife and three small children.

Winona.—The Mississippi river at this point is coming up at a surprisingly rapid rate. It has been at the highest stage experienced in a year.

Mankato.—Second district Democrats at a conference here tendered the congressional nomination to Judge J. A. Flittie of Mankato. He will likely accept.

Hibbing.—The State Game and Fish commission is expected to tour the northern part of the state this week, according to advices received by the local gun club.

Bemidji.—Nineteen new members were voted into the Commercial club at the regular monthly business meeting last week. The club now has 140 resident members and 35 non-resident.

Paynesville.—Under the auspices of the Book Lovers' club women of Paynesville are holding "civic teas" that are netting modest money returns. The accumulating funds are to be used toward developing a park in the village center.

Red Wing.—C. P. Claig, chairman of the State Efficiency commission, addressed the Red Wing Commercial club on the work of the commission. He said it did not intend to interfere with the duties of state officials, but to decide on the best way of carrying out those duties.

Fergus Falls.—F. W. Murphy of Wheaton and M. E. Harrison of Morris conferred with local citizens regarding the holding of the annual convention of the West Central Minnesota Development association in this city this summer. It has been decided to hold the meeting here June 25 and 26.

Winona.—Health Officer Donald B. Pritchard reports an unusual showing for April in that during the month not a single death was recorded in Winona from an acute disease. This is the first time during the seven years that Dr. Pritchard has been health officer that there has been such a record.

Rochester.—Dr. P. P. Witherstine of Rochester, was indorsed for congress at a conference of Democrats here. About seventy-five members of the party attended, every county being represented except Freeborn. Dr. Witherstine announced he would make the race against Congressman Anderson.

Winthrop.—Ernest C. Pless of Gibbon, will have opposition at the June primaries as representative from the twenty-first district. A. J. Erickson, a business man of Winthrop, filed for the same office and a spirited contest is expected. E. W. Zacharias, a farmer, has filed for sheriff in opposition to Charles Wegge, the incumbent.

Bemidji.—The Commercial Club is trying to get the Berse Manufacturing company of Saginaw, Mich., to locate a toothpick manufacturing plant here. An abundance of white birch timber is tributary to Bemidji. The company says that Bemidji is one of the many towns it is considering and if information from the Commercial club is satisfactory, it may locate here.

Grand Rapids.—F. F. Price of this place, filed nomination papers as a candidate for representative from the fifty-second legislative district. G. F. Peterson of Coleraine had previously filed for the nomination for the same office, and the socialists of the county have as a candidate, E. Enstrom of Bovey. The socialists are strong in the rural districts.

Staple.—Thursday was a big day in Staples for the Knights of Pythias. Accompanied by the state grand chancellor, Fred Atwood, and Major General Arthur Stabbot of St. Paul, Supreme Chancellor Carling of Georgia, arrived in the afternoon. In the evening a program was presented at the K. of P. hall, after which a banquet was served at the St. Charles hotel. All the stores were decorated in Knights of Pythias colors and emblems for the occasion.

Duluth.—A 60 per cent cut, back to the 1912 basis paid for crude Lake Superior iron ore, was received here, following word received from the east that the manufacturing interests had made that rate. This means that crude iron ore will bring $2.80 a ton and as the ore costs the company $2.50 a ton f. o. b. Duluth, but thirty cents profit remains to the producer. No official statement was made as to why the cut was made, but it was believed here that a lack of orders for both raw and finished product governed the action.

Madelia.—Forty societies were represented at the Windom district convention of Christian Endeavorers held here. R. A. Walker of Chicago, Rev. G. H. Lee of Edgerton, Minn., and Rev. A. B. Keeler of Worthington, were the principal speakers. The following are the officers for the coming year: President, Rev. Mr. Burton, Fairmont; vice president, Rev. W. F. Finch, Slayton; secretary, Miss Mabel Fanning, Madelia; treasurer, Miss Genevive Hyslop, Fulda; junior superintendent, Mrs. L. A. Gullick, Edgerton. The next meeting will be held at Worthington.

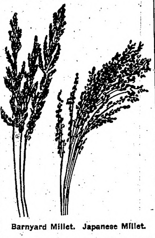
GROWING MILLET HAY

OFTEN FOLLOWS WHEAT OR OTHER WINTER CEREALS.

Problem of Maintaining Live Stock Where Feed Is Scarce and Prices High May Be Solved by Employment of This Crop.

(By A. M. SOULE.)

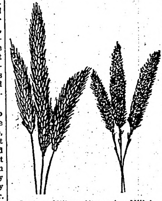
Millet can frequently be grown as a catch crop when other important crops have failed. As most varieties of this crop matures in from sixty to ninety days it can often follow wheat or other winter cereals. There are many varieties of millet on the market, but only a few of these show exceptional merit. Among the best varieties are German, Japanese and Hungarian, which made in recent tests, an average yield of hay of 3.85, 2.80 and 2.42 tons, respectively. The principal objection to the Japanese is the coarseness of the stalks, which prevent its being eaten with as much relish as the finer stemmed varieties.



Barnyard Millet. Japanese Millet.

That a large quantity of fine quality hay can be obtained by growing millet and cutting when the seed is in the early-dough stage is admitted by all, and owing to the difficulty of maintaining live stock in many sections, because of the scarcity and high price of hay, it is surprising that this crop is not more extensively cultivated. Timothy hay, for instance, which is regarded as the standard, contains 6.8 per cent of protein, 23.5 per cent of fiber, 51.7 per cent of fat. Hungarian grass contains 8.1 per cent of protein, 30 per cent of fiber, 53.1 per cent of nitrogen free extract, and 2.3 per cent of fat. Millet hay, if properly made and cured, thus contains more nutriment per ton than timothy and it is generally recognized that millet can be cultivated successfully on thousands of acres of land to which timothy is not at all adapted. Moreover, there is a marked divergence between the yields of the two crops, as it is not unusual to obtain from three to five tons of cured millet hay, as compared with one or two tons of timothy. The value of millet hay will, of course, depend somewhat on the variety sown, the richness of the soil and the thickness of seeding. Thick seeding is desirable with millet, though we prefer to plant in drills rather than scatter the seed broadcast. If the millet is not seeded thickly, the stalks become coarse and are not well relished by live stock, a fact which should not be overlooked. Since such large yields may be obtained with millet in the south, even though the crop may draw heavily on the plant food in the soil, it would bring a sufficient revenue to justify the heavy application of commercial fertilizers, and where a proper crop rotation is pursued, there should not be serious difficulty in maintaining the fertility of the land.

Millet should be seeded at the rate of forty to sixty pounds per acre—drilled in and covered with a harrow. From thirty to forty bushels of millet seed may be obtained per acre, and owing to the short time it occupies the land it can be made a very remunerative crop. Millet is no more exhausting to the soil than other crops when comparative yields are considered.



German Millet. Hungarian Millet.

Millet has another advantage which should not be overlooked, as it is a most excellent smother crop and can be used with great advantage on land which it is desired to free of weeds and put in the best possible condition for seeding to grass or wheat in the fall.

Silage From an Acre.

An acre of corn will produce from eight to twelve tons of silage.

THE DEVIL CHAIR

A Chronicle of the Strange Adventures of John Haynes and His Gyroscope Vehicle

THE FIRST VICTIM

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman)

"The devil-chair" had become a standing headline in the American papers. Each hour rumors were multiplied about the travels of the mysterious desperado who had affixed a gyroscope to an invalid's chair and, running upon a single wheel at the rate of two hundred miles an hour, was pillaging and murdering. He was reported from Philadelphia, from Baltimore, from Pittsburgh. Every strange robbery, every unsolved murder mystery in the eastern portion of the United States was laid to his charge. In every city, the police were searching for him; cripples were arrested; ropes were stretched at night across highways, to the detriment of many thousand dollars' worth of automobiles and horse flesh. But no sign of the desperado was evident, no clue was obtainable.

Had the truth been known, public opinion would have veered as strongly toward John Haynes as it now directed itself against him. For it was upon the satisfaction of private feuds that he had bent all the energies of a mind soured by imprisonment and embittered by wrongs. Robbed of vast lands in a western state through the machinations of a gang of scoundrels, railroaded to the penitentiary at Nokomis Falls and paralyzed by a treacherous bullet, he had made a gyroscope in the prison machine shop, had effected his escape, had entered New York and obtained five thousand dollars from one of those who had betrayed him, had escaped the police, and now, bent upon a clue which should bring back to him the missing wife and daughter whom he had never seen since the dramatic climax of the conspiracy against him five years before, he was hiding in the Adirondack wilderness, far from trails and human habitations, in a deserted cabin, waiting for the hue and cry to die down before proceeding to Grand Valley, where he had reason to believe his daughter was to be found.

He had made his marvelous vehicle out of an old invalid's chair which he had found in an abandoned barn, and now, in the solitude of the wilderness, he planned his movements with a precision worthy of the man who had escaped from the penitentiary in so daring a way. Grand Valley lay only twenty-five miles distant from where he lurked, but to reach it he must pass through a populous farming territory, which, crippled and paralyzed as he was, he could not hope to traverse in that vehicle for which the entire country was searching. So day by day he ate his heart out in loneliness, longing for the daughter whom he had not seen since she grew to womanhood. In the end he wheeled the chair to the edge of the forest land, hid it in a clump of trees not far from the highroad, and crawled on his crutches by night toward his destination. Once in Grand Valley, he might pass unnoticed; but on the roadside a cripple would be an object of suspicious attention. The journey occupied him three nights; he lay all day in hedges and swamps.

He had but one clue by which to find Eleanor; the name of Jack Poole, one of the least of his enemies—a treacherous friend who had urged him to the duel in which, with an empty pistol, he confronted the assassin whose bullet, entering his spine, left him helpless and paralyzed below the waist. Poole, uneasy of conscience, and growing old, had sold out his interest in the plundered property to the land gang, and had retired to play the part of village magnate in his native town.

In his real estate office Jack Poole was staring, terror stricken, at two telegrams in front of him. A weak and corpulent old man, with heavy white cheek-beard and snug, apoplectic visage, the shock of these messages had temporarily benumbed his faculties. They had arrived five days before, and never since their arrival had he dared face the world; sleepless, unshaven, he had crept from room to room of his mansion, fighting with imaginary enemies and terrors that he could not down. On the fifth morning he shaved and dressed himself, and, with a strong effort of will, went to his office again. Now, shut up in the large room with its glass partition, behind which his stenographers worked busily, he read those telegrams for the fiftieth times.

One was from Frank Staples, the Brooklyn lawyer from whom Haynes had obtained the five thousand dollars. In veiled and guarded language it recounted the episode and ended with a personal warning.

The other was from Ricardo, an Italian spy, who had served with Haynes in the penitentiary. It told of the man's escape and of the terrible machine to which Haynes owed his liberty. "See newspapers!" he ended.

And on his desk the newspapers of the past five days were spread before his eyes; in the black headlines Poole read his own approaching disaster.

His first plan was to fly; but under the stimulus of strong potations of brandy his courage revived. At the end of an hour he had mapped out his scheme. He could not warn the police, for that would call attention to his own part in the conspiracy which had been formed to wrest the land from his victim, but he knew that even in Grand Valley a sharp watch had been set for the arrival of the devil-chair and its devilish occupant. He was determined now to brazen out the affair. Once the confederates had put Haynes away; they could do it again. He slipped a pistol into his pocket and called his stenographer.

"Miss Haynes!" he shouted.

She came in immediately; a pretty, fair-haired girl, carrying a sheaf of papers.

"Never mind that, Eleanor," he said, leering at her. "Sit down. I want to talk to you, my dear."

She shot a swift glance at him; she saw that he had been drinking again. On such occasions her fear of him would almost overmaster her. She would have left him long ago—but she was his ward. She was penniless, helpless, ignorant of the world of business outside the Grand Valley. Jack Poole had meant to keep her so.

"Come here, my dear," said Poole, stretching out his arms toward her. "Do you know you are growing into a devilishly pretty girl?"

"Please, Mr. Poole!" she said imploringly.

"Please nothing!" he retorted. "See here, you imp, haven't you any gratitude in your make-up? Didn't I drag you out of the gutter and adopt you, put you to school, and take you into my office when you left last year? And when you refused to live in my house and went to that cheap boarding place I stood for it, I—"

"I left your house, Mr. Poole, when your wife left you," she answered with dignity. "I could not have stayed under the circumstances; you must know that."

"Well, suppose you did have to conciliate these narrow people in Grand Valley," he grumbled, "is that any reason why you should refuse to act as my ward? Ain't you the same as a daughter to me? And haven't you refused to be seen with me in public, or to have dinner with me—yes, even at a restaurant?"

"Please, Mr. Poole—"

"Please, Mr. Poole!" he mimicked. "I'm mighty tired of this ingratitude, you—" He checked himself upon the mouthing of a vile epithet. "The devil! What d'you suppose I've fed you and clothed you and educated you for all these years? Ain't you going to show any sense? Now see here," he said, rising and staggering toward her, "I'm going to end this nonsense. You're going to have dinner with me in a private room at Bezard's next Friday evening, at seven, and afterward—well, I'll tell you what when we meet there. And if you defy me, you can look for another job. And let me tell you this, you won't get one in Grand Valley. And I suppose you haven't saved up too much money on that five dollars a week?" he sneered.

"Now you think it over," he grumbled. "You needn't show yourself here again at all. If you act sensible and meet me at Bezard's, you'll come back to my house and live in luxury; if you don't you'd better get out of town. And there'll be a new stenographer in your place tomorrow."

She had risen, pale and terrified; she moved toward the door. Poole would have detained her, but into his drink-soaked brain there stole the shadow of his fears, those fears which he had forgotten in the excitement of his chase. He grunted and turned back to his desk.

Finally, with a groan, he tore the telegrams into small pieces and burned them in his ash-tray. He called across the partition:

"Miss Mills, see that no more newspapers are put on my desk until I tell you. I'm tired of them—I don't want to see any more. I'm sick of this 'devil-chair' business," he muttered drunkenly, as he put on his hat and staggered into the hall.

He did not notice the crippled man who slowly thumped his way, on crutches, along the street behind him. If he had done so he would not have remembered him. But, though the cripple saw him, he had no concern with him just then; he was striving desperately to keep in sight that little figure that moved dejectedly along Main street.

"How long d'you want a room for?" asked Mrs. Thompson, of No. 27 Grand avenue, looking suspiciously upon the cripple at the door. He was not over-well attired, he had no baggage, and under his long overcoat was a bulging package shaped like an enormous wheel.

"Just for two or three days," said the cripple apologetically. "I'm a working man," he added, seeing her glance at the instrument which he was carrying, "a wheelwright. I'm on a job in town and I got separated from my suitcase. But I can pay you in advance," he said, "and I won't want to sit at your table unless you'd like me."

"It'll be four dollars for the week's rent," snapped Mrs. Thompson. "I only rent by the week, and if you stay part of a week that counts as a whole one. And my table's full." She received a proffered five dollar bill, gave him his change, and conducted him up the stairs, a shade more graciously. "You can have the large room on the second," she said. "No, not that one—there's a young lady in there. Take your ease, Mr. —"

"Tupman," said the cripple, quietly.

"Take your ease, Mr. Tupman, in getting up them stairs. You'll pardon me if I'm a bit short at first—you know we're all scared to death about the devil-chair."

She watched her roomer into his chamber, and then tapped at the door adjacent. "Well, you've got a neighbor, Miss Haynes," she said. "He's a mechanic—though how he mechanics with both his legs helpless beats me. However, he seems a quiet sort of chap, and he's only going to stay a few days, so you won't mind?"

She looked keenly at Eleanor. The girl had been crying. The landlady sniffed, for she felt certain that some man must be the cause. She had a profound contempt for men, and relationship to Mr. Poole, she was well aware, was something it was not always discreet to question. Mrs. Thompson sniffed again, more loudly, and so passed out of history.

It was on a Thursday evening that the cripple stopped at Miss Haynes' door. He had made her acquaintance during those two days of suffering; he had known his child at once when he saw her leaving the office of Poole, and had pondered long how to disclose himself. On this evening, seeing the door ajar, he stopped. Eleanor came out; she looked woebegone, and she had been crying again. A rush of anger swept away his hesitation. Who was the man who dared to make his daughter cry?

"You're in trouble, Miss Haynes," he stammered. "Isn't there anything I can do?"

"Oh, no," she answered, holding out her hands impulsively. "You don't know how I appreciate your kindness, Mr. Tupman. Won't you come in a moment?" she asked, and, when he accepted her invitation eagerly, she continued half hysterically:

"It must seem strange to you—it must, asking a stranger in. But—you'll think me foolish, but you remind me of my dear father. If there were any hope that he was alive, I should believe you were my father," she went on. "But what nonsense I'm talking. I don't know what you'll think of me—I'm in trouble, and not quite self-possessed—"

She broke off in confusion. Haynes seated himself quietly at her side.

"Your father is dead?" he asked.

She began to cry softly. "He was drowned, with my mother, in that terrible accident to the excursion boat at Nokomis, five years ago. It was a terrible shock to me; I had not even known that they were aboard until their bodies were identified among the burned victims in the hold of the ship. My father and mother were English; he had brought us to America to claim some large landed property, and his lawyer sent him an urgent telegram to bring my mother to the steamship office before the boat sailed. They had to verify some deeds at Illington, up the river, before noon. I was out of the house at the time the message arrived, and they could not wait for me. I never saw them again."

Haynes felt the muscles of his hands contract involuntarily. The plot had been blacker than he had suspected. While they had lured him away on that last morning of his freedom, the scoundrels had also contrived in some way to separate the women. Doubtless his wife, if she still lived, believed him and her daughter dead.

Gradually he drew from her the story of her trouble. He learned, partly from what she told him, partly by inference, that, having separated the women, the conspirators had determined to keep the girl in such a state of tutelage that she should be unable to prosecute a search for her mother—in case she suspected or learned anything afterward. When in the bitterness of her distress, she found herself, as she imagined, alone in the world, the scoundrel Poole had adopted her, taken her hundreds of miles from Nokomis to this remote town near the Canadian border, and put her to school. When she emerged, he had taken her into his home. When, terrified by the character of the place in which she found herself, Eleanor Haynes had attempted to escape, rather than lose sight of her, Poole had given her a position in his office, keeping her salary so low that she could save nothing nor every hope to leave Grand Valley.

But her beauty and ingenuous innocence had attracted him. For months he had pursued her with his attentions; every repulse only accentuated his resolution to win her. Finally, so desperate had his passion become, that he had risked all on a single throw. He had threatened her with dismissal, noting to win her through fear, since by love he could not do so.

When he had drawn out this story from her Haynes nerved himself for the disclosure. He took her hands in his, and, trustfully, she allowed him.

"Miss Haynes," he said, in a choking voice, "your troubles with Poole seem very big to you. But they are nothing to the troubles that confront all of us as we grow older. Can you be brave enough to hear what I am going to tell you without emotion? And do you trust me?'

She looked steadily into his eyes.

"Yes, I would trust you anywhere, Mr. Tupman," she answered. "I only have to look at your eyes to know that. Bad people have shifty, cowardly eyes; yours are quite steady and clear."

"Still, it will be a shock," he answered, smiling ever so little. "Now, nerve yourself to bear it. You told me I reminded you of your father. I am your father."

She looked at him a moment longer, and then she flung her arms round his neck and burst into passionate sobs. "I knew it all the time," she cried. "I knew it; I wouldn't trust my heart, but I knew you were."

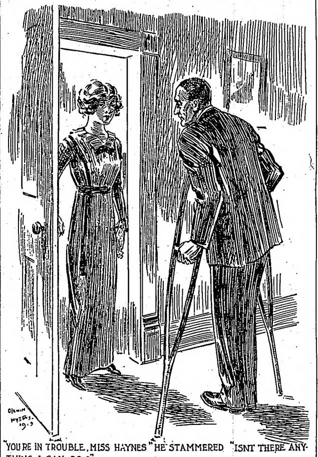
And in her calm acceptance of his statement he read an infinite courage; but also an infinite trustfulness that made him afraid. And for long they talked of the past, and he revealed himself by many little reminiscences that would have convinced her beyond doubt, had she ever doubted.

"And now, Eleanor," he said, kissing her fondly, "do you know you have not asked me where your mother is?"

"If you wanted me to know you would have told me," she answered. "No, don't tell me, my dear. I know—I know that she is dead."

In the strength of this new happiness of hers she had not even questioned him. The shock, silently as it had been received, had numbed her senses. But now she began to question eagerly, and Haynes told her.

He told her how he had been inveigled away to fight a duel with the fellow who had insulted her mother, being assured by his false friend Poole that the custom of America demanded it; how, when lying senseless, paralyzed by the bullet, he had been carried to a low quarter of the town and placed beside the body of a murdered man; how he had been tried as Pete Timmons, a gang leader, and, by a corrupt judge and through the machinations of a corrupt lawyer, sentenced to the penitentiary for 14 years; lastly, how he had escaped and come to search for her. But he did not tell her about the "devil-chair."



"YOU'RE IN TROUBLE, MISS HAYNES" HE STAMMERED "ISN'T THERE ANYTHING I CAN DO?"

He had detached the gyroscope and brought it with him into Grand valley, but he saw now that he would be unlikely to need it. For, when she unfolded her story, a new plan had taken possession of him. This vengeance upon Poole must now be doubly sacred. And because he had struck at the daughter as well as at the father, he would use Eleanor as the instrument of his revenge.

If the man had been wholly sane he would have spared her that; perhaps, too, if she had refused, his senses would have come back to him. But when he told her all he was amazed at the revelation of her nature. The timid girl became a daughter possessed with the resolution of vengeance for her father's sufferings. The fantasy of a universal revenge on all who had been privy to the plot communicated itself to her with double intensity.

She did not know he meant to kill each of his enemies; her confidence in him was so profound that she accepted blindly the task which he imposed upon her. Yet Haynes knew well that Poole must die, and that he would be the first of his victims. He would not use the law; personal vengeance, nurtured in his prison cell, had become a madness in his brain.

"You will meet him, then, at the restaurant," he told the girl. "And after dinner you will accompany him wherever he shall decide. Have no fear; I shall be waiting outside the building. You have none, Eleanor?"

"No," she said, smiling up at him.

That night, with the strength of the mighty mucles of his right hand, Haynes worked over his revolver—an automatic Leuger. His plan was so clear that he knew it could not fail. If it should fail, if Poole refused his chance to renew his treachery, then the man should go free. Haynes would, in the end, leave the issue with heaven.

That night Poole slept well for the first time since he had received those fateful telegrams. His terror of his enemy had abated; a week or so had passed, and surely he had no further cause for dread. If indeed Haynes were pursuing his enemies, it was improbable that he would seek him out; perhaps he would be caught at his first attempt, if such there should be, and why should Haynes seek out the lesser conspirators, when the leaders remained unharmed? He could not guess that the spy Ricardo, the man who had shot Haynes, had told, in terror of death, of Eleanor's presence with Poole in that remote town.

He thought that he knew human nature; he was assured of it beyond cavil when he met Eleanor outside the restaurant at the appointed hour. And, seeing her, he chuckled and smiled, for in place of the girl he knew was a woman flushed, bold even, nerved to her part by that instinct which Haynes had awakened in her—and Poole mistook all this for self-surrender.

They entered the little dining place behind the curtains which had been reserved for them, and Eleanor laughed, even her repulsion for the man driven down by her determination. Poole, completely illusionized, patted her arm.

"You look fine, Puss, positively fine," he said ecstatically. "Why, I always thought you were such a timid little thing. And you were sly, devilishly sly, to hide yourself from me like that. So you always meant to come, eh?"

Eleanor nodded briskly.

"And you were holding out for something big—a rope of pretty pearls, now, or a diamond bracelet, eh?"

Eleanor nodded and laughed.

He grew more familiar as the dinner advanced and he became flushed with wine. She let him hold her hand and press his lips to it; she listened as he unveiled his propositions to her. She was to come back to him, of course, and as soon as he obtained his divorce they were to be married. Meanwhile, as his ward, she was to live in his house; they would return that very evening for his chauffeur was waiting outside.

The chauffeur was John Haynes. For, with $500 in his pocket, Poole's real chauffeur was waiting at the railroad station to take the night train to New York city.

But how was Poole to know that in the dark? Poole, drunk and flushed and triumphant, bearing Haynes' daughter on his arm and leering and chuckling.

"Home, George," he said thickly, and settled back in the automobile. His eyes blinked heavily, he muttered something, then his head fell on Eleanor's shoulder and he began to snore. The want of sleep had told on him during those days of fear; he had shrunken into a haggard old man, horrible to look upon.

This simplified John Haynes' plans, for, with his crippled leg, he had doubted his ability to cope with the man, should his suspicions become aroused. Now, slowing the machine, he leaned backward, and abandoning it for a moment, whispered:

"Have you found what I spoke of?"

"Yes, my dear," he heard her whisper, and through the darkness she stretched out one arm. In it was the pistol which Poole had carried since he had put his terrors behind him and resolved to face his fate manfully.

John Haynes twisted the automobile into the middle of the road and drew his automatic Leuger from his pocket. He placed it in Eleanor's hands.

"Slip it into his pocket," he said, and she obeyed, feeling the dead weight of the man on her shoulder as he collapsed drunkenly with the spring of the machine. He slept so soundly that it was not until the automobile stopped, 25 miles from Bezard's, that he awakened.

"Ain't we home yet, George?" he muttered, and opened his eyes wide. "Why, where the devil have you taken me, you fool?" he shouted wrathfully. "I don't see no lights nor nothing. Where is this? The Adirondacks?"

"Yes, Mr. Poole, the Adirondacks," Haynes answered, and limped heavily to the ground. He motioned his daughter away, and, advancing, confronted him. "Do you know me?" he asked.

He saw the drunkard peer eagerly at him as he stood leaning upon his crutch in the light of the acetylene lamps. He saw the drunken vacuousness pass from his features, and a look of terror succeed.

"I see you do," said Haynes.

Suddenly with an oath, Poole whipped out the revolver from his pocket—to find the cripple covering him. Hayne's hand did not waver, though he was bowed heavily upon his crutch.

"Put it back in your pocket, Poole," he said. "Now, speak, man. You know what I want to know."

In abject fear Poole trembled so that he could not speak.

"You dog!" said Haynes, trembling now so that his pistol mouth described wide circles—but Poole was too terrified to notice this—"you dog! What have you to say?"

"They used me as a tool," muttered the terrified old man. "Beyers and Robertson, and Frank Staples. Why should I bear the blame? I'll give you back what I can. You won't take the life of an old man?"

"What of my daughter?" Haynes roared, hobbling forward and pressing his enemy back against the wheel of the machine. "Yours was the dog's part, Poole. You lured me to what you thought would be my death, you whom I could have pardoned, had you fought like a man for your ill-gotten spoils. You sent that false telegram which lured my wife away. Where is she?"

In the extremity of his terror Poole found sense to make a bargain.

"I know, I know," he stammered. "But why should I tell you if I am going to die? Come, a bargain, Mr. Haynes. I haven't been all bad; I fed and cared for your girl all this time, even if I did lose my head over her at last. Other men have done that with other women," he babbled. "You won't hold that against the money I've spent on her? Now listen! a bargain. I'll tell you how to find your wife and give you back $20,000—I'll have to mortgage my home to do it—and you'll let me go. I'm an old man; I've got to die soon; it's no use having murder upon your hands."

Haynes regarded the shrinking figure with awful sternness; his pistol did not waver now.

"Poole," he said, "I'd hate to kill a thing so mean as you. I'd hate to send your naked soul shivering into the fires of hell before your time had come. I give you your life, Poole, and your money, too—that I shall get from the chief conspirators. Here are the conditions: you tell me where my wife is and you play fair with me. If you try treachery, it will recoil on you."

"I agree, I agree," shrilled Poole eagerly. "Chauncey E. Robertson knows; she's living and unharmed, and that's all I can tell you. Go to Chauncey in Benderville and play the same trick on him that you have played on me. He'll tell you—if you make him."

"She's living, then—thank God!" exclaimed John Haynes, and as though overcome by his emotion, he staggerd backward, letting his pistol fall.

There came a spurt of flame, the crack of the Luegar. Poole, seeing his enemy disarmed, had fired at him point blank. Eleanor ran forward, screaming. Then, seeing her father straighten himself upon his crutches and laugh, and point to the automobile. She followed his gaze fearfully.

Jack Poole lay on the steps of the machine. He was quite dead, for the bullet from the reversed Lueger had gone clean and straight through his right eye into his brain. John Haynes had not worked over it fruitlessly.

So, by his own treachery, the first of the conspirators came to his death.

Haynes flung the body into the road and placed his daughter in the automobile. Then, stepping among the trees, he drew out the devil-chair and deposited it in the tonneau beside the detached gyroscope. He looked at his watch.

"We can catch the Chicago train at Purfield in an hour and a half, Eleanor," he said. "You will go on alone. Here are $4,000." He placed the bills in her hands. "You must be brave, my dear, and play your woman's game like a man, confiding in no one, passing as a stenographer from the south, eager to find work. Place your funds in four different banks, get a position, and wait till you hear from me at the General postoffice. It may be in one week or not for a year. You are not afraid?"

"No," she answered, and though her face was white her voice was steady and clear. He kissed her fervently; then limping into his place, he drove furiously across the country toward their destination. At Purfield he hid the chair under the rugs, bought his daughter's ticket to Chicago, and helped her aboard the train; he waited till the read lights had vanished down the track. Then he drove into the wilderness again, removed the plate with its number, hid the machine in the depths of the forest, and, fastening the gyroscope to the invalid chair, entered it and whirled away westward.

Robbers Make Him Real Angry; He Beats Three

CHICAGO.—"Do you know how it feels to be held up and look down the barrel of a revolver within six inches of your face? Well, it makes me sore, sore all through—I get so mad I don't think of anything but just trying 'to get' the fellow that tries," and Ambrose B. Chadwick, who gave three gunmen the thrashing of their lives, doubled up his fist and shook it at no one in particular.

Three armed men held up Mr. Chadwick almost in front of his home at 711 South Hermitage avenue, the other night. The next minute they thought a wildcat had fallen into their midst. Mr. Chadwick received a split lip and a bullet hole through a trouser's leg. It is not thought that the gunmen will be able to put in much time at their trade for some time.

If you want to come through a holdup with flying colors here are several bits of advice offered by Mr. Chadwick in telling of his experience:

"As I was coming toward my house I saw these three men coming toward me. Just as I got to them the biggest fellow shoved a gun within six inches of my face.

"It was no more than leveled before I grabbed it with my right hand around the cylinder and shoved it up in the air. I'm left handed and when the next to the biggest fellow let drive at me with his fist, I ducked a bit and reached for him. Then they started to run, and fired on me."

Taxidermists Preserve Remains of Big Eagle

SPOKANE, WASH.—The remains of an eagle, not only the largest one ever killed in the Rockies, but one which played an important part in a romance of the Colville Indians many years ago, have been preserved by taxidermists of this city. The bird, with a spread of seven feet, is the property of Clair Hunt, allotting agent for the Indians on the south half of the Colville reservation, in eastern Washington. The eagle is credited by the Indians with having saved a man's life and thereby indirectly causing a double murder.

About thirty years ago two young Indians, twin brothers, fell in love with the most beautiful and attractive girl on the reservation. The rivalry existed for two years. Finally one captured the prize, much to the disappointment of the jealous brother. For several months the young couple lived happily in a tepee in the shadow of a cliff where the far-famed eagle's nest was located.

One day the brothers went to the cliff to secure eagle feathers. The married one, being much the lighter, was lowered to the shelf on which the nest was built. As soon as he was lowered, the scheming brother dropped the rope, hurried to the tepee and took the young bride and rode away.

From his high perch the Indian husband could see his bride being carried away. At sunset the old eagle returned and with a shrill scream swooped down upon the unwelcome guest, burying his talons in the neck and face of the despondent brave. The Indian, not caring whether he lived or died, grasped the legs of the infuriated bird and plunged over the cliff.

The bird and its human passenger floated to the valley and landed within a few yards of the deserted tepee.

The enraged husband pursued the couple and killed them both.

Final Cigarette Foils Elaborate Suicide Plans

SHREVEPORT, LA.—In a quiet ward at the City hospital, "Chris" Bills, swathed in a perfect bathrobe of gauze, made the unequivocable statement that he is through with cigarettes. Coupons or no coupons, he is done with that form of dissipation for good, for, as he says, when a habit has caused all the trouble in a man's life and then upsets his death it is no longer a habit—it's a nuisance.

The other day "Chris" was as busy as could be along toward four o'clock in the afternoon. About half an hour before his wife, to whom he had not spoken in more than a week, had left the house, and before going had given him a general outline of what she thought of him.

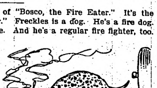
He stuffed all the keyholes in the doors, pulled down the windows tight, wrote one of the saddest suicide notes ever written and prepared to arbitrate with his wife through the medium of the gas company.

"Chris" was still puttering around making up his mind about how to be discovered, when it occurred to him that he might be less nervous if he lit a cigarette.

When "Chris" was found on the roof of the First Baptist church soon after the explosion his head was resting in a bureau drawer.

New York Engine House Dog Abhors Small Fires

NEW YORK.—This is not the story of "Bosco, the Fire Eater." It's the story of "Freckles, the Fire Fighter." Freckles is a dog. He's a fire dog. He is the mascot at No. 1 engine house. And he's a regular fire fighter, too. If you are skeptical, a call any time at the engine house will satisfy you, for, like the men of the Jackson department, Freckles is always on duty and will stage his fire eating exhibition any time.

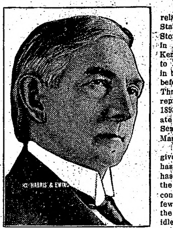


The dog actually puts out fires. He has a natural or trained instinct (the point is in dispute) to abhor fires, and a burning match thrown on the floor, pipe dumpings or cigar stub, or a purposely lighted piece of paper, will immediately arouse his ire. He looks at the blaze or smoke, as the case may be, a minute, then paws it first with the right foot, then with the left, until it is out.

Then he chews the "ruins"—cigar stub, charred paper or whatever it may be—and then ejects it. It is not an accident, either, as a test any time will show Freckles "on duty"

Some of the men of the department say "Freckles," so named because of his spots, being a coach dog, fights fire naturally. Two men say he has been trained to do the unusual stunt. These men are George Kuhn and Paul A. Bagalke. They say George Kuhn and Paul Bagalke trained the animal. Anyway, he is quite a wonder. He is amusing and a real fire fighter, with one exception—he runs and hides when an alarm comes in. He refuses to do any fire fighting outside of No. 1 engine house.

SENATOR STONE'S HOBBY



The new chairman of the foreign relations committee of the United States senate, Senator William Joel Stone, is one of the prominent figures in national life at Washington. A Kentuckian by birth, he later removed to Missouri and was long prominent in the politics of the "show me" state before the toga descended to him. Three times elected to the house of representatives and governor from 1893 to 1897, he was ripe for the senate when chosen to succeed the late Senator Vest for the term beginning March 4, 1903.

Senator Stone, to whom has been given the soubriquet of Gumshoe Bill, has filled with credit every office he has held. While he is not gifted with the graces of oratory, his speeches are convincing. He says a great deal in a few words and is a past master in the art of condensation. He is never idle and it is said that he keeps a special scrapbook of what he regards as the "misdeeds" of his political adversaries.

Senator Stone, like a good many others, has a hobby. A hobby is a good thing to have, because it produces a complete change of mind and thought and action which is necessary to keep one in mental trim. His hobby is poetry. He is much addicted to reciting lines from such authors as Shakespeare, Shelley, Poe, Longfellow, Whittier and hosts of others.

SAW THE THING HIMSELF

Representative W. P. Borland of Missouri, member of the house appropriations committee, was one of the party that went to Panama recently in its interests. On the way back the weather was fine, and much time was spent on deck telling stories and forgetting, for the moment, the serious side of the big problem of the government in the canal.

They touched port for an hour or two, a couple of days out, and met an American who had come down to get rich off an investment in a pleasure resort on the seashore. He had introduced the usual amusements found at such places, and the natives were coming in hordes to spend what little money they had and try the thrilling trips through "enchanted isles," "Arabian nights' dream," "the laughing mirrors," etc.

Another American, younger, and of course, used to all the gaudy nonsense of such entertainments, was a visitor in the little town nearby, and came out every day to his countryman's place to try the surf.

While Representative Borland and some of his fellow-countrymen were talking with the American investor this young man ran out of the water, fairly breathless, saying a native "down there" (pointing to a half-clad Jamaican on the sands below) had cried out to him that a shark had been seen in that very place the day before.

"Oh, well—he was mistaken—that wasn't a shark yesterday. I saw that thing myself; I remember now. That was just a swordfish, that's all!"

U. S. GRANT III. FOLLOWS ANCESTOR

Many people will be interested in the news received the other day that Capt. U. S. Grant III, grandson of President U. S. Grant, and only son of the late Maj. Gen. Frederick D. Grant, is in command of company E, United States engineer corps, with General Funston's command.

In Captain Grant's departure, and service, at Vera Cruz, history seems to be repeating itself. It was in Mexico that his grandfather, Gen. U. S. Grant, then a captain, won his spurs, serving with distinction under General Scott.

Captain Grant's mother was Miss Ida Honore, daughter of H. H. Honore of Chicago. Mrs. Grant has been spending the winter with her son in Galveston, Texas.

The young man graduated in 1903 from the military academy at West Point with high honors, taking a high rank in his studies as well as in his military duties there.

His advance since his graduation from West Point has been rapid, and faithful performance of his duties has won for him the commendation of his superior officers.

JUNIUS SPENCER MORGAN

Twenty-five years ago J. P. Morgan, Jr., son of J. P. the First, was a senior at Harvard college; this year his son is to receive his degree from the same college. But if you were to step into "Mem," the great Harvard dining hall, and asked every man of the thousand who eat there, what sort of a man Junius Spencer Morgan is. nine out of ten would say, "Who is he? What's he done here?"

All you can say is, "Why, he's the grandson of old J. P." Then this is what you'll get:

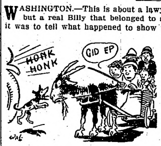
"That so? Didn't know he was in college."

It's strange—because this man is going to control the greatest financial agency in America, some day; he is going to invest millions of American dollars; some day he may be able to avert a panic. And down at Harvard they don't even know of his existence. He used to live on the Gold Coast—that is Harvard's Fifth avenue. Its real name is Mt. Auburn street, but it is called the Gold Coast on account of the millions that motor up and down in front of the luxurious Harvard dormitories.

NATIONAL CAPITAL AFFAIRS

Great Excitement, But the Goat Was Serene

WASHINGTON.—This is about a lawyer and a goat. Not the lawyer's goat, but a real Billy that belonged to a boy. All the lawyer had to do with it was to tell what happened to show the serenity of a goat when subjected to excitement. And as a serene goat isn't an everyday affair, here goes:



Scene, Massachusetts avenue as it enters Scott circle. Hour, about 9:15, when bankers, brokers, corporation lawyers and capitalists of early bird habits were whizzing downtown in their limousines, touring cars and what not—which means any vehicle above a street car—until they came to the goat.

He was on the wrong side of the street. And he wouldn't budge.

The conveyance to which he was hitched—a box on wheels, 1914 model—was crowded with sections of six small boys whose legs were dangling outside. They urged and beseeched, cajoled, threatened and whacked, but the goat calmly chewed his gum and stayed put.

Perhaps he had a hunch that his one best way to get rid of hauling six boys was to refuse to haul one. So he stood and stood and stood, until—

The composite banker, broker, corporation lawyer and early bird capitalist canned in his nifty machine had blocked the asphalt, and the street was fringed with mere everyday humans, who will have to walk until they acquire wings. No reference whatever to airships. Then a blue cloth guardian of the law breezed into the foreground and—

Got his goat.

Call Him the Story Teller in Chief to the House

ONE funny story in one ten-minute speech, by all tradition, unwritten rules and precedent of the house of representatives, is amply sufficient. But since this administration has set its face against following precedent, Tom Heflin, representative from Alabama and story teller in chief to the house, has started out loyally to upset tradition. He has taken to telling two stories instead of one in the time mentioned. Here are two samples Mr. Heflin recently interjected into debate:

"A fellow had lost an eye, and he said to the surgeon, 'Doc, I have just naturally got to have another eye, and I don't want any glass eye. I want a flesh eye.' The doctor replied, 'I can put a cat's eye in for you.' The man said, 'All right, just so I can see with it.'

"So the surgeon very skilfully transplanted the cat's eye in the place of the one the man had lost. In about three months the surgeon saw his patient and said, 'Bill, how is your eye?' Bill replied, 'Well, Doc, it is all right, I guess. The only objection I have got to the darned thing is that it is always looking for crickets and mice.'"

The second one:

"On one occasion a dyspeptic preacher went home with a member of his church for dinner. The good wife had prepared a feast fit for the gods.

"Bud, the nine-year old son, with fork in hand, was just ready to do battle with the good things before him, when his mother said, 'Parson, won't you have some of the chicken?' To their surprise and the utter bewilderment of Bud, the parson replied, 'No; I never eat chicken.'

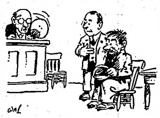
"The good lady then asked, Parson, have a piece of ham.' But the parson answered, 'No, I dare not eat ham.' Bud dropped his fork.

"The good lady then said, 'Won't you have a biscuit?' and the parson replied, 'Did you use soda in the composition of those biscuits?' Well, then, I cannot eat biscuits made with soda.'

"Bud, in wide-eyed astonishment, looked at his mother and exclaimed, with anger and earnestness, 'Ma, maybe the darned old fool would suck a raw egg!'"

How a North Carolina Moonshiner Won His Case

REPRESENTATIVE E. W. POU of North Carolina tells a good one on himself. He says: "In my home county was a man by the name of Reaves, who was indicted for a violation of the revenue laws, and retained me to defend him. As he was regarded as a weak-minded man, the judges were disposed to be lenient, though the evidence was conclusive as to his guilt.



"I told Reaves that he must act as foolish as he could in order to help his case. So on the day the case was tried Reaves appeared in court—it was a roasting summer day—wearing a heavy overcoat buttoned up to his throat.

"When the court was opened by the marshal Reaves jumped up and made a spectacle of himself by calling out foolish statements. As the judge would have to take action, I rose and told the judge that he could see for himself that my client was not a responsible person; so the case was nolle prossed and Reaves told to go and sin no more."

Why John Sharp Williams Never Joined the Army

SENATOR JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS was never in the Confederate army. But the fault is not his. He started with the best intentions, as well as with a knapsack filled with a good lunch. The war was at its height when he was a big boy of eleven, and as his father was in the army, and dozens of friends and relatives had gone forth to battle against the dreaded "Yank," John Sharp one night decided that his country called him to arms. The fact that he was only eleven, and about the only road he knew was that to the candy shop, did not deter him. Out in the darkness of the night the "call" of his country sounded as loud as the dinner horn to hungry hands in the harvest field.

I'M GOIN' TO THE WAR

So young Williams arose and set forth down the road in the early dawn. And as he tramped down the lanes of dust, past the still farmhouses over which hung the early smoke from the kitchen chimney, he dreamed dreams of how he would come back on a prancing charger covered with glory, gore and gold lace. Then suddenly behind him he heard the lope of an approaching horseman. Looking back, he saw it was old Uncle Zeph on the blind mule. Uncle Zeph pulled up the mule with a jerk beside his young master.

"John, your maw says as how you better be gittin' back home in a hurry. She ain't er goin' ter stand fur no sich goin's on!" exploded Zeph. "You jest clim' up here 'bind me on dis mule and he'll tote us home ter breakfast!"

So John climbed aboard the mule and turned his face homeward, leaving in the ashes of a dead past his high hopes of military glory.

ENVOYS REALIZE HUERTA'S RULE IS FAST CRUMBLING

FALL OF DICTATOR IS CONCEDED BY MEXICAN MEDIATION DELEGATES, IT IS REPORTED.

ADMIT WAR WITH U. S. MAY BE PROVOKED BY FEDERALS

Fears are Entertained that Army Near Vera Cruz May Do Something That Will Lead to Resumption of Hostilities—Talk of Successor.

Washington, May 19.—Intimation of the attitude of the Huerta delegates to the mediation conference to be held at Niagara Falls Wednesday, was obtained from persons said to be in touch with the envoys. The Mexicans refused to talk of their plans before their departure.

Three are Optimistic.

That the three were optimistic regarding the chances for mediation was learned from quarters in close touch with them. They have little idea how long the arrangement of a settlement will keep them at Niagara Falls, but they are confident their trip will not have been in vain.

The Mexican delegates are said to realize that the present administration in Mexico City is fast crumbling and that the choice of some one to succeed Huerta is inevitable.

After Huerta, What?

But conceding the retirement of Huerta, the delegates are said to be most interested in the vital question of what is to follow, what guarantees are to be obtained against the possible confiscation of property by the invading Constitutionalists, protection against conditions of anarchy, and what kind of government will be stable and will obtain world-wide recognition.

On the other hand, those close to President Wilson and Secretary Bryan say that the question to be mediated is no longer the failure of Huerta to salute the flag or the offenses committed against the dignity of the United States, but the broad question of pacifying Mexico. Those who know the broad-minded view of the Washington administration declare the American troops will not be withdrawn from Vera Cruz until a stable government is established or is in sight in Mexico City.

Mexican Envoys Federals.

Persons close to the Mexican delegates emphasized that the three men who will represent the Huerta government are not "Huertaistas or the representatives of any group of any people, but were representatives of the interests of the territory controlled by the Federals."

Though technically the delegates are dealing with an international question—the differences which arose with the United States out of the Tampico incident—privately they admit that before them is the problem of the actual pacification of Mexico.

Persons close to Emilio Rabasas, chairman of the Mexican commission, and intimate adviser of Huerta, said when the time came for their answer to suggestions as to a successor for Huerta they probably would insist that no man who had gained military prominence or was obtaining power "by arbitrary force," as set forth in President Wilson's Latin-American declaration, should be permitted to take the reins of government. This would eliminate Generals Carranza and Villa, but there are other men in the Constitutionalist ranks who are looked upon as of presidential caliber who would be acceptable to the Huerta faction.

War Yet Possible.

Although General Huerta has sent the delegates here to mediate the differences and they know his viewpoint, there is a possibility—and it is admitted by representatives of all Mexican factions here—that hostilities may at any time be provoked by the Federal troops near Vera Cruz, which may generally entangle the situation and force another crisis. Huerta's whimsical moods are pointed to by even some of his friends as a dangerous aspect of the situation.

That the Huerta delegates are men of the highest ability is admitted by Constitutionalists. In settling the Mexican questions these delegates, according to their friends, will not be guided by the personal ambitions of any one man, but will recommend the things which their independent judgment of the situation will dictate.

Tell of Murder of Americans.

San Francisco, May 18.—Graphic reports of the murder of Americans, the capture by a Mexican transport of the American brig Geneva, and the imprisonment of United States Consul Clement S. Edwards of Acapulco were brought in by 150 refugees on the British steamer Cetriana from Manzanillo. According to the refugees, when news of the capture of Vera Cruz reached the west coast it was taken by the Mexicans as the beginning of war. Americans abandoned their homes and fled.

PANAMA CANAL NOW IN USE

TRAFFIC PASSING THROUGH IS THE REPORT.

Twelve-Hour Barge Service From Atlantic to Pacific in Effect, Washington Dispatch Says.

Washington, May 15.—For the first time in the world's history waterborne traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans is now passing through the Panama canal, according to the reports that have been received at the headquarters of the Panama railroad in New York, forwarded here.

Though confirmation of the report has not yet reached the Washington office of the isthmian canal, it is known that ample provision had been made by Colonel Goethals for the institution of water service, limited at first strictly to barges, beginning not later than May 10. As a matter of fact, according to the Panama railroad reports, the service actually began last Saturday and a steady stream of barges in tow is now passing through the canal.

Colonel Goethals has not yet reported to Washington just when the canal will be opened to merchant shipping, but the understanding here is that the waterway is practically finished and that even now there is a sufficient channel through the Culebra cut for almost any warship or liner.

It is understood that this barge service is to be operated on about twelve hours' schedule from the Atlantic to the Pacific, which allows about an hour's delay in each of the locks.

"NO VOTE---NO KISS" SLOGAN

Suffragist Has Novel Plan for Forcing Men to Grant Franchise to Women.

New York, May 18.—A kissing strike is the newest method in the votes for women war.

"If we women all go on strike and agree not to kiss our husbands until we get the vote," Mrs. Havelock Ellis told the members of the woman suffrage party, "and if we agreed also not to cook, or wash, or even look at our husbands, we would get it much quicker than by the present program of destroying art treasures and golf grounds.

"All we need to do is to sit still with our hands in our pockets and a noncommittal smile on our countenances, while we watch the men running to bring us the vote. Let us take as our motto, 'To break hearts rather than windows.'

"Yes, sisters, it is true that effective results would be forthcoming should we insist, with authority, upon compliance with the slogan, 'No vote—no kiss.'"

Strikers Killed While Escaping.

Denver, Colo., May 18.—Louis Tikas (Louis, the Greek), James Fyler and Frank Rebino, Ludlow strikers, were shot and killed on the night of April 20 while running from the military lines toward the burning tent colony, directly in the line of fire between the militia and strikers, according to testimony of Sergeant P. N. Cullom and Private Frank M. Mason, at the trial of Major Patrick J. Hamrock, before the general court-martial. The strikers had been taken prisoners, said the witnesses.

WOMAN FAN STARTS A RIOT.

St. Louis, May 16.—The principals of two public schools, acting as umpires, were stoned and the majority of 600 schoolboy spectators engaged in a general fight during a riot started by a woman at a baseball game here. The woman took exception to the ruling of one of the umpires when he called the boy at bat out on strikes. She rushed onto the diamond, yelling "Protest! Protest!" and was followed instantly by the grand stand constituents of both teams.

THIRTEEN DAYS OF AWFUL SUFFERING

FOUR SURVIVORS OF BURNED SHIP COLUMBIAN FINALLY SAVED FROM SEA.

LIMIT OF HUMAN ENDURANCE

Almost Exhausted From Starvation and Cold When Seneca Crew Sights Boat—12 Had Already Succumbed.

Halifax, N. S., May 19.—After 13 days of terrible suffering in an open boat, four survivors of the freight steamer Columbian were picked up in the north Atlantic by the United States revenue cutter Seneca.

Twelve Others Succumbed.

Twelve others of the boat's crew which left the Columbian when she was burned just south of Sable Island on May 3, had succumbed to injuries and privations and their bodies had been thrown overboard. The death toll of the lost freighter now stands at 16. Twenty-seven other members of the crew were saved by the Cunard liner Franconia and the steamer Manhattan after two days of exposure.

The men just snatched from death by the Seneca were the first officer, Robert Tiere, and Seamen Oscar Kendall and Peter Bellanger, and Fireman Michael Ludwigsen. The Seneca reached Halifax this morning.

Limit of Endurance.

The survivors had lived on only a few ship's biscuits and a cask of water which had long since been exhausted. They had gone the limit of human endurance.

Hope for this missing third boat had been abandoned after a dozen of the trans-Atlantic liners searched for five days within a wide radius of the spot where the Columbian burst into flames. To seafaring men, it seemed impossible that a small boat could pass through the series of gales that have since swept those waters, and the news that the Seneca had picked up survivors was received here almost with incredulity.

Although the survivors were too weak from their suffering to tell the story completely, the revenue cutter's officers gathered that some of the 16 who had hastily piled into the third boat had been so badly burned that they died within the first few days. It was decided to lighten the boat by casting the bodies overboard.

Some Die of Cold.

Some who had tumbled from their bunks at the first explosion and had rushed on deck half-clothed, succumbed to the cold. Others, weakened by hunger and thirst, gradually sank into lethargy that was scarcely to be distinguished from death.

Somehow the survivors managed to keep the boat head-on to the seas when the weather became rough, but for the past few days little or no effort could be made to guide the craft. Day by day the number dwindled until the four who were left sank limply to the bottom of the boat and awaited the end.

Cattle Queen of Utah Dies.

Salt Lake City, May 18.—Mrs. Elizabeth Bonnemort, known through the West as the cattle and sheep queen of Utah, died at her home here. Mrs. Bonnemort came to Utah from Scotland in 1865 at the age of 20 years and immediately engaged in the cattle and sheep business with great success. Later she became identified with the real estate business in Salt Lake, which, with her cattle ventures, netted her a fortune computed at $2,000,000.

EXPLOSION KILLS THIRTEEN

ONE IS DYING AND THREE ARE FATALLY INJURED.

Blast Blows Detroit Rubber Factory to Pieces—Many Narrowly Escape.

Detroit, May 16.—Thirteen men were killed and three terribly injured in an explosion which blew the plant of the Mexican Crude Rubber company to pieces. There were about twenty-five employees working in the plant. Twelve survivors have been accounted for. Gasoline is believed to have been responsible for the explosion.

Most of the victims were skilled mechanics. One body was blown through the building. Three other bodies were burned beyond recognition. Three men were removed to a hospital and physicians said they did not expect any of the men would survive. Dozens of windows in buildings near the rubber company's plant were shattered.

There were several reports as to the cause of the explosion, but survivors said a vat containing a large quantity of molten rubber exploded. Officials of the company declined to issue a statement until they conducted an investigation.

The plant, a one-story concrete building, in West Detroit, was almost obliterated. Flying chunks of substance riddled adjoining buildings and concrete blocks weighing pounds, were found more than two blocks from the scene of the explosion.

The explosion was witnessed by scores of pedestrians and there were many narrow escapes. One man told the police he heard a roar; the concrete factory seemed to split into three huge pieces, two of which "melted away." The third, he said, shot high into the air, breaking into fragments and went whizzing in every direction.

SALTILLO ATTACK TO FOLLOW

Believed Villa Will Capture Important City Thus Completing Federal Downfall.

Torreon, Mex., May 16.—General Francisco Villa, in command of the Constitutionalist army now moving upon Saltillo, before his departure said he is prepared to meet any situation which may arise. His army is amply provisioned for 30 days and it appears he has enough ammunition for the task before it. Each man carried from 250 to 400 rounds of ammunition in his belts. It is said also there is an amply supply of artillery ammunition.

That Saltillo will be taken is confidently believed by the Constitutionalists here, although apparently the Federals will have most of the advantages.

With Saltillo in the hands of the Constitutionalists it is thought here the Huerta government will have lost all claim to control of the greater half of Mexico. The Federals must then retire upon San Luis Potosi, making it possible for the government of the North to concentrate its troops on that port without fear of being outflanked.

Picture Slasher Sentenced.

London, May 15.—Mary Ansell, the militant suffragist, who Tuesday slashed the Royal Academy portrait of the Duke of Wellington by Hubert von Herkomer, was sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

Run Closes Iowa Bank.

Corning, Iowa, May 18.—The First National bank of Corning failed to open its doors following a run in which about $50,000 in deposits was withdrawn. The institution was closed on the order of the comptroller of the currency and W. W. Smith, of St. Louis, a bank examiner, is in charge. R. R. Newcomb is the president and B. Newcomb the cashier. The capital stock of the bank was $100,000, with deposits at $220,000. Resources not counting capital stock already placed at $280,000.

LAUNCH CAPSIZES; FIVE ARE DROWNED

FATAL ACCIDENT OCCURS ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT MINNEAPOLIS.

THREE BELONG TO A FAMILY

Man Holds Wife by Hair and Saves Sister's Child on Back While His Own Children are Whirled to Death By Eddies.

Minneapolis, May 19.—Five persons were drowned in the capsizing of an overcrowded 16-foot launch in the Mississippi river at Thirty-third avenue northeast at 3 p. m. Sunday. Four more of the party were rescued from three or four bobbing logs snagged in mid-stream onto which they had crawled after half an hour in the water whose current carried them four blocks.

Those Who Lost Lives.

Those drowned were: Mrs. Otto Justman, 2812 Harriet avenue south; Orville Justman, 7 years old; Justman baby, 8 months old; Norman Buchholz, 5 years old; Harold Buchholz, 2 years old.

The rescued included: John C. Buchholz, 1830 Marshall street northeast; Mrs. John C. Buchholz; Fred Weber, Merrill, Wis.; Helen Justman, 9 years old.

The body of Harold Buchholz was found floating at Fifteenth avenue, 18 blocks from the scene of the accident, an hour later. Too short a turn in a big eddy overturned the heavily-loaded launch as if it were a canoe.

John C. Buchholz, who drove the launch, kept his wife and his sister's daughter afloat. His own two children were drowned. Fred Weber, aged 20, of Merrill, Wis., struggled to save Mrs. Justman and failed. She and two of her children were drowned.

Man Saves Wife.

Buchholz struggled to a cluster of logs, gripping his wife by the hair and with his sister's little girl clinging around his neck. Merrill followed him. The woman and child were pushed onto the logs, Mrs. Buchholz unconscious. They clung there until three employes of the General Electric company's nearby plant took them off in a boat.

Otto Justman was fishing and not until late did he learn of the accident that took three of his family of four. Mr. and Mrs. Buchholz have no children left.

Launch Turns.

When the launch capsized, it spun over and over on its side and afforded no refuge. One of the Buchholz children was shoved onto it for an instant, then it whirled again and the child disappeared. The same whirl that drowned his child threw Mrs. Buchholz within the reach of Mr. Buchholz. In another spin the boat struck Mrs. Justman from the arms of Weber and she sank.

Boat and floundering people were carried fast down the river.

Only One Body Recovered.

Fifty men began search for bodies immediately under the direction of police of the north and east stations. The only body recovered was that of Harold Buchholz, the clothing of a two-year-old keeping him afloat. The fact that his body was found 18 blocks from the spot where the launch overturned discouraged hope of early recovery of the other bodies.

It was a family dinner party that went out for a short ride.

TROOPS ARE READY TO SAIL

Six Army Transports Waiting to Carry Men and Supplies on 5 Hours Notice.

Galveston, Tex., May 18.—Six army transports lie along side the government piers in readiness to carry troops, horses and supplies to Vera Cruz. Embarkation officers say that five hours after an order to sail has been received the transports will be loaded with soldiers and headed toward Mexico.

Within the last four days the quartermaster's department has converted the steamship Denver into a troop ship which will carry 1,400 men.

The Colorado is now a floating stable and can transport 450 horses. The freighter Kansas, due here from ports in the West Indies, will be made over into a stable ship with a capacity of 900 horses.

The regular army transports Meade, Sumner and Kilpatrick are loaded with coal, provisions for a voyage, and supplies for the troops already in Vera cruz. The newly chartered transports are expected from New York some time next week.

The army is preparing itself for a possible campaign through the Mexican mountain passes, where the nights are cold. Hundreds of boxes containing hoodless overcoats have been unloaded on the government 143,000 Visitors in Atlanta.

Atlanta, Ga., May 15.—Tuesday carried the peak of the load of Atlanta's burden of entertainment for the Shriners. The early part of the week the Shriners took care of themselves. From now on they will take care of Atlanta. Stores closed until 1 o'clock to give the public the opportunity of seeing 90 Temples and 30,000 Arabs marching down Peachtree street, in a stupendous spectacle. It is estimated that 43,000 of the nobility, and 100,000 country visitors are here.

WESTERN CANADA'S PROSPECTS FOR 1914

Excellent Spring for Work and Wheat Seeding About Finished.

The writer has just returned from an extensive trip through the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, in Western Canada. The crop conditions are the very best, and no one locality seems to have an advantage over another in this respect. The uniformity in growth is remarkable, and in all parts of the three provinces spring wheat at the time of writing, May 10th, is well above the ground from two to three inches. Considerable fall plowing was done last year, and this, with the summer fallow, is already seeded, so that practically wheat seeding is over by this date. Everywhere the farmers are busy and the whole country presents one great scene of activity—three-horse, four-horse and five-horse teams are busy preparing land for barley, oats and flax. On some of the larger farms batteries of steam and gasoline outfits are at work, but in a great many districts where these have been operated in the past they are being displaced by horses, owing no doubt partially to the difficulty of securing experienced men to operate them. Anyway, there is being put into agriculture in Western Canada, greater effort with more promise than for some years past. The soil is in the best possible condition; moisture has been sufficient, there have been no winds to dry out the soil, and if the farmers have had to lay up for a day or so now and again, it was merely that the ground might have the advantage of the rain and an occasional snow, which promise so much for the growing crop. With some warm weather the grain will come along in a manner that will equal the best years Western Canada has ever had.

It must not be thought from this that the farmers are full bent on securing a grain crop alone. In nearly every district there is more and more the indication and inclination to go into mixed farming. Herds of cattle now dot the plains that up to the present had been fully given up to grain growing, hogs and sheep are in evidence. New buildings are to be seen on a great many places, these being pig houses and cow stables, although protection of cattle is not regularly required, excepting for calves and such cows as it may be necessary to house from time to time.

The growing of alfalfa and other fodder grasses is an industry that is being rapidly developed.

During this spring a splendid class of new settlers have gone in, many of them from the eastern states. These have seen what success the western and central states man has achieved in Western Canada, and are now going in in hundreds. The movement from Montana, Oregon and Washington to Canada continues without any abatement as to numbers and value of effects, while the central and eastern states are still sending an excellent class of farmers with means sufficient to begin farming on a scale that will pay from the start.

Those who contemplate visiting the Panama Exposition next year will find that one of the most interesting trips they can make will be via the Canadian West. There will be three lines of railway they can use—the Canadian Pacific, Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Pacific, all of which will have through to coast lines completed. Thus will be given a view of prairie, woodland and mountain scenery unexcelled in America.—Advertisement.

Cold-Day Decision.

Father—Tommie, would you rather go to the show and split your sides, or go to the wood pile and split some wood?

Tommie—If it's just the same to you, father, I'd rather split the difference and sit here by the fire.

FACE ITCHED AND BURNED

383 No. Union St., Aurora, Ill.—"My ailment started with a little pimple and it always itched and burned terribly. I scratched it and in a few days my face was all covered with sores. It ran up to my eyes and the day after I could not see out of my right eye. I was unable to get any rest. I couldn't go to bed, being afraid of getting the clothing all soiled, although I had my face all bandaged.

"I was given two jars of salve but it kept getting worse. It was something like a running sore because every time I used some of the salve I had to wrap bandages around my neck to keep the water and pus from running down my body. I wrote for a sample of Cuticura Soap and Ointment and in a few days I received these and washed my face with the Cuticura Soap and put on some Cuticura Ointment and the next morning my face felt cool and somewhat relieved. After using the sample I bought some Cuticura Soap and Ointment at the drug store. I followed this treatment just twenty-six days and after using one cake of Cuticura Soap and two boxes of Cuticura Ointment I was cured." (Signed) George Miller, Jan. 1, 1913.

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in a road house near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city and identifies the body. A young woman who accompanied Wrandall to the inn and subsequently disappeared, is suspected. Mrs. Wrandall starts back for New York in an auto during a blinding snow storm. On the way she meets a young woman in the road who proves to be the woman who killed Wrandall. Feeling that the girl had done her a service in ridding her of the man who though she loved him deeply, had caused her great sorrow. Mrs. Wrandall determines to shield her and takes her to her own home. Mrs. Wrandall hears the story of Hetty Castleton's life, except that portion that relates to Wrandall. This and the story of the tragedy she forbids the girl ever to tell. She offers Hetty a home, friendship and security from peril on account of the tragedy. Mrs. Sara Wrandall and Hetty attend the funeral of Challis Wrandall at the home of his parents. Sara Wrandall and Hetty return to New York after an absence of a year in Europe. Leslie Wrandall, brother of Challis, makes himself useful to Sara and becomes greatly interested in Hetty. Sara sees in Leslie's infatuation possibility for revenge on the Wrandalls and reparation for the wrongs she suffered at the hands of Challis Wrandall by marrying his murderess into the family. Leslie, in company with his friend Brandon Booth, an artist, visits Sara at her country place. Leslie confesses to Sara that he is madly in love with Hetty. Sara arranges with Booth to paint a picture of Hetty. Booth has a haunting feeling that he has seen Hetty before. Looking through a portfolio of pictures by an unknown English artist he finds one of Hetty. He speaks to her about it. Hetty declares it must be a picture of Hetty Glynn, an English actress, who resembles her very much.

CHAPTER IX.—Continued.

Leslie was coming out on an evening train. Booth, in commenting on this, again remarked a sharp change in Hetty's manner. They had been conversing somewhat bouyantly up to the moment he mentioned Leslie's impending visit. In a flash her manner changed. A quick but unmistakable frown succeeded her smiles, and for some reason she suddenly relapsed into a state of reserve that was little short of sullen. He was puzzled, as he had been before.

The day was hot. Sara volunteered to take him home in the motor. An errand in the village was the excuse she gave for riding over with him. Heretofore she had sent him over alone with the chauffeur.

She looked very handsome, very tempting, as she came down to the car.

"By Jove," he said to himself, "she is wonderful!"

He handed her into the car with the grace of a courtier, and she smiled upon him serenely, as a princess might have smiled in the days when knighthood was in flower.

When she sat him down at his little garden gate, he put the question that had been seething in his mind all the way down the shady stretch they had traversed.

"Have you ever seen Hetty Glynn, the English actress?"

Sara was always prepared. She knew the question would come when least expected.

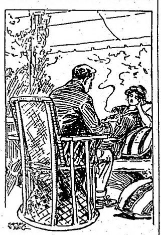
"Oh, yes," she replied, with interest. "Have you noticed the resemblance? They are as like as two peas in a pod. Isn't it extraordinary?"

He was a bit staggered. "I have never seen Hetty Glynn," he replied.

"Oh? You have seen photographs of her?" she inquired casually.

"What has become of her?" he asked, ignoring her question. "Is she still on the stage?"

"Heaven knows," she replied lightly. "Miss Castleton and I were speaking of her last night. We were together the last time I saw her. Who knows? She may have married into the nobility by this time. She was a very poor actress, but the loveliest thing in the world—excepting our Hetty, of course."



"It's All Tommy-Rot," He Growled.

If he could have seen the troubled look in her eyes as she was whirled off to the village, he might not have gone about the cottage with such a blithesome air. He was happier than he had been in days, and all because of Hetty Glynn!

Leslie Wrandall did not arrive by the evening train. He telephoned late in the afternoon, not to Hetty but to Sara, to say that he was unavoidably detained and would not leave New York until the next morning. Something in his voice, in his manner of speaking, disturbed her. She went to bed that night with two sources of uneasiness threatening her peace of mind. She scented peril.

The motor met him at the station and Sara was waiting for him in the cool, awning-covered verandah as he drove up. There was a sullen, dissatisfied look in his face. She was stretched out comfortably, lazily, in a great chaise-lounge, her black little slippers peeping out at him with perfect abandonment.

"Hello," he said shortly. She gave him her hand. "Sorry I couldn't get out last night." He shook her hand rather ungraciously.

"We missed you," she said. "Pull up a chair. I was never so lazy as now. Dear me, I am afraid I'll get stout and gross."

"Spring fever," he announced. He was plainly out of sorts. "I'll stand, if you don't mind. Beastly tiresome, sitting in a hot, stuffy train."

He took a couple of turns across the porch, his eyes shifting in the eager, annoyed manner of one who seeks for something that, in the correct order of things, ought to be plainly visible.

"Please sit down, Leslie. You make me nervous, tramping about like that. We can't go in for half an hour or more."

"Can't go in?" he demanded, stopping before her. He began to pull at his little moustache.

"No. Hetty's posing. They won't permit even me to disturb them."

He glared. With a final, almost dramatic twist he gave over jerking at his moustache, and grabbed up a chair, which he put down beside her with a vehemance that spoke plainer than words.

"I say," he began, scowling in the direction of the doorway, "how long is he going to be at this silly job?"

"Silly job? Why, it is to be a masterpiece," she cried.

"I asked you how long?"

"Oh, how can I tell? Weeks, perhaps. One can't prod a genius."

"It's all tommy-rot," he growled. "I suppose I'd better take the next train back to town."

"Don't you like talking with me?" she inquired, with a pout.

"Of course I do," he made haste to say. "But do you mean to say they won't let anybody in where— Oh, I say! This is rich!"

"Spectators upset the muse, or words to that effect."

He stared gloomily at his cigarette case for a moment. Then he carefully selected a cigarette and tapped it on the back of his hand.

"See here, Sara, I'm going to get this off my chest," he said bluntly. "I've been thinking it over all week. I don't like this portrait painting nonsense."

"Dear me! Didn't you suggest it?" she inquired innocently, but all the time her heart was beating violent time to the song of triumph.

He was jealous. It was what she wanted, what she had hoped for all along. Her purpose now was to encourage the ugly flame that tortured him; to fan it into fury, to make it unendurable. She knew him well: His supreme egoism could not withstand an attack upon its complacency. Like all the Wrandalls, he had the habit of thinking too well of himself. He possessed a clearly-defined sense of humor, but it did not begin to include self-sacrifice among its endowments. He had never been able to laugh at himself for the excellent reason that some things were truly sacred to him.

She realized this, and promptly laughed at him. He stiffened.

"Don't snicker, Sara," he growled. He took time to light his cigarette, and at the same time to consider his answer to her question. "In a way, yes. I suggested a tort of portrait, of course. A sketchy thing, something like that, you know. But not an all-summer operation."

"But she doesn't mind," explained Sara. "In fact, she is enjoying it. She and Mr. Booth get on famously together."

"She likes him, eh?"

"Certainly. Why shouldn't she like him? He is adorable."

He threw his cigarette over the railing. "Comes here every day, I suppose?"

"My dear Leslie, he is to do me as soon as he has finished with her. I don't like your manner."

"Oh," he said in a dull sort of wonder. No one had ever cut him short in just that way before. "What's up, Sara? Have I done anything out of the way?"

"You are very touchy, it seems to me."

"I'm sore about this confounded portrait monopoly."

"I'm sorry, Leslie. I suppose you will have to give in, however. We are three to one against you—Hetty, Mr. Booth and I."

"I see," he said, rather blankly. Then he drew his chair closer. "See here, Sara, you know I'm terribly keen about her. I think about her, I dream about her, I— oh, well, here it is in a nutshell: I'm in love with her. Now do you understand?"

"I don't see how you could help being in love with her," she said calmly. "I believe it is a habit men have where she is concerned."

"You're not surprised?" he cried, himself surprised.

"Not in the least."

"I mean to ask her to marry me," he announced with finality. This was intended to bowl her over completely.

She looked at him for an instant, and then shook her head. "I'd like to be able to wish you good luck."

He stared. "You don't mean to say she'd be fool enough—" he began incredulously, but caught himself up in time. "Of course, I'd have to take my chances," he concluded, with more humility than she had ever seen him display. "Do you know of any one else?"

"No," she said seriously. "She doesn't confide in me to that extent, I fear. I've never asked."

"Do you think there was any one back there in England?" He put it in the past tense, so to speak, as if there could be no question about the present.

"Oh, I dare say."

He was regaining his complacency. "That's neither here nor there," he declared. The thing I want you to do, Sara, is to rush this confounded portrait. I don't like the idea, not a little bit."

"I don't blame you for being afraid of the attractive Mr. Booth," she said, with a significant lifting of her eyebrows.

"I'm going to have it over with before I go up to town, my dear girl," he announced, in a matter-of-fact way. "I've given the whole situation a deuce of a lot of thought, and I've made up my mind to do it. I'm not the sort, you know, to delay matters once my mind's made up. By Jove, Sara. you ought to be pleased. I'm not such a rotten catch, if I do say it who shouldn't."

She was perfectly still for a long time, so still that she did not appear to be breathing. Her eyes grew darker, more mysterious. If he had taken the pains to notice, he would have seen that her fingers were rigid.

"I am pleased," she said, very gently.

She could have shrieked the words. How she hated all these smug Wrandalls!

"I came to the decision yesterday," he went on, tapping the arm of the chair with his finger tips, as if timing his words with care and precision. "Spoke to dad about it at lunch. I was coming out on the five o'clock, as I'd planned, but he seemed to think I'd better talk it over with the mater first. Not that she would be likely to kick up a row, you know, but—well. for policy's sake. See what I mean? Decent thing to do, you know. She never quite got over the way you and Chal stole a march on her. God knows I'm not like Chal."

Her eyes narrowed again. "No," she said, "you are not like your brother."

"Chal was all right, mind you, in what he did," he added hastily, noting the look. "I would do the same, 'pon my soul I would, if there were any senseless objections raised in my case. But, of couse, it was right for me to talk it over with her, just the same. So I stayed in and gave them all the chance to say what they thought of me—and, incidentally, of Hetty. Quite the decent thing, don't you think? A fellow's mother is his mother, after all. See what I mean?"

"She is quite satisfied, then, that you are not throwing yourself away on Miss Castleton," said Sara, with a deep breath, which he mistook for a sigh.

"Oh, trust mother to nose into things. She knows Miss Castleton's pedigree from the ground up. There's Debrett, you see. What's more, you can't fool her in a pinch. She knows blood when she sees it. Father hasn't the same sense of proportion, however. He says you never can tell."

Sara was startled. "What do you mean?"

"Oh, it's nothing to speak of; only a way he has of grinding mother once in a while. He uses you as an example to prove that you never can tell, and mother has to admit that he's right. You have upset every one of her pet theories. She sees it now, but—whew! She couldn't see it in the old days, could she?"

"I fear not," said she in a low voice. Her eyes smouldered. "It is quite natural that she should not want you to make the mistake your brother made."

"Oh, please don't put it that way, Sara. You make me feel like a confounded prig, because that's what it comes to, with them, don't you know. And yet my attitude has always been clear to them where you're concerned. I was strong for you from the beginning. All that silly rot about—"

"Please, please!" she burst out, quivering all over.

"I beg your pardon," he stammered. "You—you know how I mean it, dear girl."

"Please leave me out of it, Leslie," she said, collecting herself. After a moment she went on calmly: "And so you are going to marry my poor little Hetty, and they are all pleased with the arrangement."

"If she'll have me," he said with a wink, as if to say there wasn't any use doubting it. "They're tickled to death."

"Vivian?"

"Viv's a snob. She says Hetty's much too good for me, blood and bone. What business, says she, has a Wrandall aspiring to the descendant of Henry the Eighth'"

"What! The Murgatroyds go back to old Henry, straight as a plummet. 'Gad, what Vivvy doesn't know about British aristocracy isn't worth knowing. She looked it up the time they tried to convince her she ought to marry the duke. But she's fond of Hetty. She says she's a darling. She's right: Hetty is too good for me."

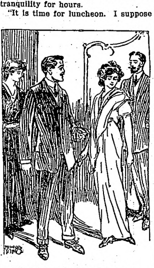
Sara swished her gown about and rose gracefully from the chaise-longue. Extending her hand to him she said, and he was never to forget the deep thrill in her voice:

"Well, I wish you good luck, Leslie. Don't take no for an answer."

"Lord, if she should say no," he gasped, confronted by the possibility of such stupidity on Hetty's part. "You don't think she will?"

Her answer was a smile of doubt, the effect of which was to destroy his tranquility for hours.

"It is time for luncheon. I suppose we'll have to interrupt them. Perhaps it is just as well, for your sake," she said tauntingly.



He Blinked in Astonishment.

He grinned, but it was a sickly effort.

"You're the one to spoil anything of that sort," he said, with some acerbity.

"I?"

"Certainly," he said with so much meaning in the word that she flushed.

Hetty and Booth came into view at that instant. The painter was laying a soft, filmy scarf over the girl's bare shoulders as he followed close behind her.

"Hello!" he cried, catching sight of Wrandall. "Train late, old chap? We've been expecting you for the last hour. How are you?"

He came up with a frank, genuine smile of pleasure on his lips, his hand extended. Leslie rose to the occasion. His self-esteem was larger than his grievance. He shook Booth's hand heartily, almost exuberantly.

"Didn't want to disturb you, Brandy," he cried, cheerily. "Besides, Sara wouldn't let me." He then passed on to Hetty, who had lagged behind. Bending low over her hand, he said something commonplace in a very low tone, at the same time looking slyly out of the corner of his eye to see if Booth was taking it all in. Finding that his friend was regarding him rather fixedly, he obeyed a sudden impulse and raised the girl's slim hand to his lips. As suddenly he released her fingers and straightened up with a look of surprise in his eyes; he had distinctly heard the agitated catch in her throat. She was staring at her hand in a stupefied sort of way, holding it rigid before her eyes for a moment before thrusting it behind her back as if it were a thing to be shielded from all scrutiny save her own.

"You must not kiss it again, Mr. Wrandall," she said in a low, intense voice. Then she passed him by and hurried up the stairs, without so much as a glance over her shoulder.

He blinked in astonishment. All of a sudden there swept over him the unique sensation of shyness—most unique in him. He had never been ashamed before in all his life. Now he was curiously conscious of having overstepped the bounds, and for the first time to be shown his place by a girl. This to him, who had no scruples about boundary lines.

All through luncheon he was volatile and gay. There was a bright spot in his cheek, however, that betrayed him to Sara, who already suspected the temper of his thoughts. He talked aeroplaning without cessation, directing most of his conversation to Booth, yet thrilled with pleasure each time Hetty laughed at his sallies. He was beginning to feel like a half-baked schoolboy in her presence, a most deplorable state of affairs he had to admit.

"If you hate the trains so much, and your automobile is out of whack, why don't you try volplaning down from the Metropolitan tower?" demanded Booth in response to his lugubrious wail against the beastly luck of having to go about in railway coaches with a lot of red-eyed, nose-blowing people who hadn't got used to their spring underwear yet.

"Sinister suggestion, I must say," he exclaimed. "You must be eager to see my life blood scattered all over creation. But, speaking of volplaning, I've had three lessons this week. Next week Bronson says I'll be flying like a gull. 'Gad, it's wonderful. I've had two tumbles, that's all—little ones, of course—net result a barked knee and a peeled elbow."

"Watch out you're not flying like an angel before you get through with it, Les," cautioned the painter. "I see that a well-known society leader in Chicago was killed yesterday."

"Oh, I love the danger there is in it," said Wrandall carelessly. "That's what gives zest to the sport."

"I love it, too," said Hetty, her eyes agleam. "The glorious feel of the wind as you rush through it! And yet one seems to be standing perfectly still in the air when one is half a mile high and going fifty miles an hour. Oh, it is wonderful, Mr. Wrandall."

"I'll take you out in a week or two. Miss Castleton, if you'll trust yourself with me."

"I will go," she announced promptly.

Booth frowned. "Better wait a bit," he counseled. "Risky business, Miss Castleton, flying about with fledgelings."

"Oh, come now!" expostulated Wrandall with some heat. "Don't be a wet blanket, old man."

"I was merely suggesting she'd better wait till you've got used to your wings."

"Jimmy Van Wickle took his wife with him the third time up," said Leslie, as if that were the last word in aeroplaning.

"It's common report that she keeps Jimmy level, no matter where she's got him," retorted Booth.

"I dare say Miss Castleton can hold me level," said Leslie, with a profound bow to her. "Can't you, Miss Castleton?"

She smiled. "Oh, as for that, Mr. Wrandall, I think we can all trust you to cling pretty closely to your own level."

"Rather ambiguous, that," he remarked dubiously.

"She means you never get below it, Leslie," said Booth, enjoying himself.

"That's the one great principle in aeroplaning," said Wrandall, quick to recover. "Vivian says I'll break my neck some day, but admits it will be a heroic way of doing it. Much nobler than pitching out of an automobile or catapulting over a horse's head in Central park." He paused for effect before venturing his next conclusion. "It must be ineffably sublime, being squashed—or is it squshed?—after a drop of a mile or so, isn't it?"

He looked to see Miss Castleton wince, and was somewhat dashed to find that she was looking out of the window, quite oblivious to the peril he was in figuratively for her special consideration.

Booth was acutely reminded that the term "prig" as applied to Leslie was a misnomer; he hated the thought of the other word, which reflectively he rhymed with "pad."

It occurred to him early in the course of this one-sided discussion that the hostess was making no effort to take part in it, whether from lack of interest or because of its frivolous nature he was, of course unable to determine. Later, he was struck by the curious pallor of her face, and the lack-luster expression of her eyes. She seldom removed her gaze from Wrandall's face, and yet there persisted in the observer's mind the rather uncanny impression that she did not hear a word her brother-in-law was saying. He, in turn, took to watching her covertly. At no time did her expression change. For reasons of his own, he did not attempt to draw her into the conversation, fascinated as he was by the study of that beautiful, emotionless face. Once he had the queer sensation of feeling, rather than seeing, a haunted look in her eyes, but he put it down to fancy on his part.

And Leslie babbled on in blissful ignorance of, not to say disregard for, this strange ghost at the feast, for, to Booth's mind, the ghost of Challis Wrandall was there.

Turning to Miss Castleton with a significant look in his eyes, meant to to call her attention to Mrs. Wrandall, he was amazed to find that every vestige of color had gone from the girl's face. She was listening to Wrandall and replying in monosyllables, but that she was aware of the other woman's abstraction was not for an instant to be doubted. Suddenly, after a quick glance at Sara's face, she looked squarely into Booth's eyes, and he saw in hers an expression of actual concern, if not alarm.

Leslie was in the middle of a sentence when Sara laughed aloud, without excuse or reason. The next instant she was looking from one to the other in a dazed sort of way, as if coming out of a dream.

Wrandall turned scarlet. There had been nothing in his remarks to call for a laugh, he was quite sure of that. Flushing slightly, she murmured something about having thought of an amusing story, and begged him to go on, she wouldn't be rude again.

He had little zest for continuing the subject and sullenly disposed of it in a word or two.

"What the devil was there to laugh at, Brandy?" he demanded of his friend after the women had left them together on the porch a few minutes later. Hetty had gone upstairs with Mrs. Wrandall, her arm clasped tightly about the older woman's waist.

"I dare say she was thinking about you falling a mile or two," said Booth pleasantly.

But he was perplexed.

CHAPTER X.

Man Proposes.

The young men cooled their heels for an hour before word was brought down to them that Mrs. Wrandall begged to be excused for the afternoon on account of a severe headache. Miss Castleton was with her, but would be down later on. Meanwhile they were to make themselves at home, and so on and so forth.

Booth took his departure, leaving Leslie in sole possession of the porch. He was restless, nervous, excited; half-afraid to stay there and face Hetty with the proposal he was determined to make, and wholly afraid to forsake the porch and run the risk of missing her altogether if she came down as signified. Several things disturbed him. One was Hetty's deplorable failure to hang on his words as he had fondly expected her to do; and then there was that very disquieting laugh of Sara's. A hundred times over he repeated to himself that sickening question: "What the devil was there to laugh at?" and no answer suggested itself. He was decidedly cross about it.

Another hour passed. His heels were quite cool by this time, but his blood was boiling. This was a deuce of a way to treat a fellow who had gone to the trouble to come all the way out in a stuffy train, by Jove, it was! With considerable asperity he rang for a servant and commanded him to fetch a time table, and to be quick about it, as there might be a train leaving before he could get back if it took him as long to find it as it took other people to remember their obligations! His sarcasm failed to impress Murray, who said he thought there was a schedule in Mrs. Wrandall's room, and he'd get it as soon as the way was clear, if Mr. Wrandal. didn't mind waiting.

"If I minded waiting," snapped Leslie, "I wouldn't be here now."

As the footman was leaving, Sara's automobile whirled up to the porte cochere.

"Who is going out, Murray?" he called in surprise.

"Miss Castleton, sir. For the air, sir."

"The deuce you say!" gasped the harassed Mr. Wrandall. It was a pretty kettle of fish!

Hetty appeared a few minutes later, attired for motoring.

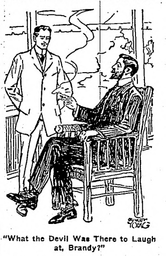
"Oh, there you are," she said, espying him. "I am going for a spin. Want to come along?"

He swallowed hard. The ends of his mustache described a pair of absolutely horizontal exclamation points. "If you don't mind being encumbered," he remarked sourly.

"I don't in the least mind," said she sweetly.

"Where are you going?" he asked without much enthusiasm. He wasn't to be caught appearing eager, not he. Besides, it wasn't anything to be flippant about.

"Yonder," she said, with a liberal sweep of her arm, taking in the whole landscape. "And be home in time to dress for dinner," she added, as if to relieve his mind.



"What the Devil Was There to Laugh at, Brandy?"

"Good Lord!" he groaned, "do we have to eat again?"

"We have to dress for it, at least," she replied.

"I'll go," he exclaimed, and ambled off to secure a cap and coat.

"Sara has planned for a run to Lenox tomorrow if it doesn't rain," she informed him on his return.

"Oh," he said, staring. "Booth gets a day off on the portrait, then."

"Being Sunday," she smiled. "We knock off on Sundays and bank holidays. But, after all, he doesn't really get a holiday. He is to go with us, poor fellow."

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1879

There are three candidates in the field for the nomination for Representative from this district: Two of them can be nominated at the June primaries, and only one can be elected in November. Both Mr. Stenvick of Bagley and Mr. Duffy of Red Lake Falls have declared themselves as favoring county option, while Mr. Jones of Bagley is silent on this subject. As we have repeatedly said we don't care how a representative that we support votes on this question. But we as a farmer and tax payer are in favor of electing a man to this important position who is pledged to work to try to stop the useless waste of the people's money by feeding so many feeders at the public crib.

Without making any argument as to the qualifications of these three men, let us ask you this question: Do you not think that anyone of them is likely to look a little out for his own interest after he is elected? We do. Now in this case, John Duffy is a heavy real estate owner, both in this and Red Lake County, and don't you think that he will be looking out for the interest of the farmer tax payers, first last and all the time? We do, because it is for his own interest to do it, and when he is looking out for his own interest he is looking out for ours, while the other two are not caring so much whether taxes increase or decrease.

* * *

Now that C. L. Hanson, candidate for State Senator, has pledged himself to vote for county option, we do not see where the temperance people who are supporting D. P. O'Neil have a peg to hang their hat on.—Sunbeam.

Oh, but they'll support O'Neill all right, the word has already been sent out to ditch Hanson and support "Dad" O Neill. One of the ardent "drys" admitted to this paper last week, that he was an O'Neill supporter. This man said: "Oh, we've got Hanson on record, all right, and that's all we care about him.—T. R. Falls News Press.

We do not agree with the News Press on the above statement. Some hot headed politician undoubtedly made the above statement to him, but that class of people are in a hopeless minority in this district, when it comes to votes, instead of wind. The large majority of tax payer voters are taking an active interest in the election of members of the legislature this year, and we believe that a majority of them are in favor of county option. When C. L. Hanson came out and publicly indorsed county option, it threw a hot bomb into their camp which exploded with deadly effect. Now they are mad and will say anything to try to get the turn of the tide from Hanson to O'Neill, but it won't go this year, for Mr. O'Neill absolutely has not one claim to present to a voter asking for his support. We have no personal ill will toward Mr. O'Neill, but his record in the legisture does not entitle him to a re-election to represent the farming interests of this northern Minnesota district.

Mr. Lee could be depended on to stop the reckless policy of State departments, that pile up deficits contrary to law and then come to the Legislature for help. No doubt, he would put a check, for example, on the Game and Fish Commission.—T. R. Falls Times.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

To the Voters of the new 65th District, composed of the Counties of Pennington, Clearwater and Red Lake:

I hereby announce myself as a candidate for Representative for the said district. I solicit your support and votes at the primaries to be held June 16th, 1914.

I have been a resident of the District for the past thirty-two years and have I believe, grown to know the wants and needs of the citizens of the district, and as political platforms have been eliminated by the Non-Partisan Election Law, I therefore hold it to be the duty of all persons seeking legislative honors to declare themselves upon public questions affecting the welfare, health and morals of the people of the State

If nominated and elected, I pledge myself to use my best efforts and ability to work for the following legislation:

Legislation for economy and efficiency in State Administration of business affairs for the purpose of lightening the burden of the present high taxes.

I favor putting the telephones of the state under the supervision of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission and compelling physical connection of lines and regulation of rates.

I shall encourage the adoption of the Revolving Fund Amendment, known as House File No. 1242. Also the Initiative Referendum Amendment.

Equal suffrage for women.

I favor the sale of foreign bonds held by the State of Minnesota, and the investment of the permanent funds of the State in improving our own state, instead of loaning them to other states at a low rate of interest. The money should be used to finance our Counties, Cities, Drainage Projects, School Districts and Loans on Resident Farm Property.

I favor the increase in the royalties paid the State when the present mineral leases expire.

I favor Consolidation and Reduction of the State Board Commissions in the interests of economy.

I favor the submission of the liquor question to the vote of the people, to the end that communities where they are of the opinion that right living and higher morals may be attained by the elimination of liquor, may at least have an opportunity of putting their views to the test.

I also favor liberal allowances for advertising the resources of the State with a view of reducing immigration.

I firmly believe in the rule of the people and if elected shall support every measure which may tend to increase the power of the State government and all measures which may tend to the betterment of the condition in the rural communities.

Hoping you will give my platform due consideration and favor me with your franchise, I am most

Respectfully,
JOHN A. DUFFY.

ROLAND BREEZES

Ella Sahl is reported on the sick list this week.

Quite a number of people attended the 17th of May festivities at Oklee Sunday.

Mrs. Nels Fore closed a very successful term of school last Saturday, she rendered a pleasing program in the evening.

The Nesland boys have recently completed a church at Wanke, they will soon commence the erection of a large barn near Garnes.

The Roland Ball team sojourned to Oklee May 17th where they played their first game of ball this season. The game was very interesting until about the middle of the game, both sides playing good ball, when Oklee began to hand us dirty decisions. However we kept up courage and continued playing until the last inning, when on of the Roland batters first man to bat placed out a liner over 3rd base, making an easy two bagger. The ball landed all of two feet inside the base line, but Oklee had the gall to call it a foul. This our boys could not stand, and the game was called off. We will not mention the scores as they ran high on both sides. We see Oklee's finish when they meet us on our Waterloo, in two weeks.

Ole Jore a pioneer of Roland passed away very suddenly at his home Sunday May 17th in the afternoon. He had been failing for some time but not enough to keep him altogether confined, Sunday forenoon he was about looking at his fields and at some breaking he wished done. Upon his arrival home, he was taken suddenly sick, and death followed almost instantly. Mr. Jore was a very well known man, in his younger days he was a successful school teacher. He is survived by a sister Hegge Jore and a nephew Ole Tweeten both of this place, and a sister in Norway. Interment took place at the Clearwater Synod church Wednesday. Rev. Palm officiating.

Churchyard Yew Trees.

One reason given why very old yew trees are so often found in country churchyards is that originally these trees were planted to supply the peasants with wood for their bows, for in lawless times it was soon discovered that the only place where trees would be safe from nightly marauders was the churchyard, where the most hardened thief dared not venture between darkness and dawn.—London Mail.

NEW AGRICULTURAL BOOSTING METHOD

FARM TRAINS ARE TRYING PLANS THAT ARE VERY NOVEL.

SHORT COURSE ON WHEELS

Northern Minnesota Railroads Assisted by University Farm School Making Many Departures.

Duluth.—The Duluth, Missabe & Northern and the Duluth & Iron Range railroads, assisted by the agricultural department of the University of Minnesota, are putting on something new in the way of agricultural trains. This is a "farmers' short-course train."

Agricultural trains heretofore have made a practise of stopping at several places each day. This train is making a stop of a whole day at each place on the schedule. By this means an effort is being made to get into close touch with the farmers and gather first-hand knowledge of their individual problems.

Another Novel Departure.

And this means another departure of rather novel kind. The train arrives at each town late in the afternoon, and the instructors aboard visit all of the farmers possible before the meeting next day. Automobiles are carried with the train for this purpose.

Well-arranged programs for men, for women, and for children are featured. The audience cars also are curtained so that stereopticon lectures may be given, and practical work in seed cleaning, in the treatment of seed potatoes, in the figuring of rations and in the scoring of potatoes and stock will be given.

County and state contest work in growing potatoes, alfalfa and corn, and in raising chickens are being fully explained to the young people. Professor N. E. Chapman ("Uncle Norton") County Agricultural Agent K. D. Van Wagenen, and Secretary Giflin of the County Fair association, have charge of this.

Special Car for Women.

A special car for the ladies is being carried with the train. In this is fitted up a model farm kitchen, the equipment being such as any farm home may have at little expense. Modern methods in the preparation of food and the care of a home are demonstrated.

There is also a car of farm machinery.

To stimulate interest, stock is being brought to the train by farmers, to be judged. There is also a potato contest, with prizes ranging from $15 to $2.50 for the best packs of potatoes brought to the train.

Staff of Instructors.

The corps of instructors includes: Mark Thompson, Fred Ward, K. D. Van Wagenen, A. B. Hostetter, R. L. Giflin, N. E. Chapman, A. J. McGuire, Miss Mary L. Bull, W. A. Dickinson, N. A. Young and Miss S. M. Rowe.

Prospective Bridegroom Kills Self

Pipestone.—To accidentally shoot and kill himself on his twenty-third birthday was the fate of Will Moriarity of Luverne and his body was brought here for burial. Moriarity, in company with his sweetheart to whom he was to have been married the next day, was on a railroad speeder between here and Luverne when a rifle which he was carrying fell from the car. In pulling the weapon back upon the speeder it was discharged and a bullet lodged in Moriarity's head.

Struck on Head by Shot.

Faribault.—Francis Warmington, 9-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Gibson Warmington, was seriously injured while playing on the athletic grounds of the Lincoln school. Several boys were playing with a twelve-pound shot, which had been used during the field sports. The Warmington boy was struck on the head accidentally by the shot and his skull was fractured.

Team Killed; Doctor Injured.

Winona. — Crossing the railway tracks at Dover village, a buggy containing Dr. W. F. Flannery of St. Charles, was struck by a switch engine. Both horses were killed, the buggy was dragged several rods and demolished and the driver was hurled into the top of the carriage. He was seriously injured. A string of box cars obstructed his view of the tracks at the crossing.

Fined $100 for Speeding.

Mankato.—Glenn H. Allyn, who has been eight times before the court on charges of violating the law regulating the use of automobiles has been sentenced by Municipal Judge Comstock to pay a fine of $100 and costs for speeding.

CASWELL OUT FOR CLERK OF SUPREME COURT AGAIN

Irving A. Caswell, who is clerk of the Minnesota Supreme Court, is a candidate for re-nomination.

PER CAPITA WEALTH IS $1,218

Each Person's Share Would Be That Taxable If Property of State Were Distributed.

St. Paul.—If the taxable real and personal property in Minnesota were distributed evenly among the 2,250,000 inhabitants of the state, each man, woman and child would have approximately $1,218 worth to his credit.

This is shown by figures gathered by the state tax commission. Last year the total assessed valuation of real and personal property aggregated $1,370,000,000.

This at the most is not more than 50 per cent of the actual value of the property listed. Using this proportion as a basis for the estimate of the true value it is found to be $2,740,000,000, and dividing by 2,250,000 the result is $1,218.

These figures do not take into consideration the assessment for moneys and credits, which in 1913 was $156,000,000.

This, however, is not more than 25 per cent of the value of these two items. Using this proportion as a basis the total would be swelled by $624,000,000, and increase the $1,218 per capita by $277, making the total really $1,495.

7th District Women Meet.

Ortonville. — The twelfth annual convention of the Seventh District of Women's clubs convened here with seventy-five present. The following towns were represented: Marshall, Benson, Appleton, Willmar, Morris, Montevideo, Graceville and Clinton. Mrs. C. L. Atwood of St. Cloud, state president, gave the principal address, speaking on "Social Conscience." She said in part, "in the past women have been exclusively domestic, leaving to man all the world. It is one of the great aims of women's clubs to get rid of idle wives of busy, successful men and convert them into women of service to the public uplift and betterment."

Sue Autoists for $5,000.

Red Wing.—It is learned authoritatively that suit has been instituted against Ralph H. Babcock, Andrew Berke and S. N. Claussen by the heirs of Mrs. Alfred Anderson to recover $5,000 damages as the result of the woman being run down and killed by Babcock's car a year ago. It is learned that Babcock carried an insurance of $5,000, protecting himself in case of accident or injury to others in the operation of his touring car.

He was taken before a probate judge and was committed to the asylum for the insane at Fergus Falls.

RESERVE BANK TO OPEN AUG. 1

BANKS NAMED TO PERFECT ORGANIZATION OF DISTRICT.

Five Institutions Selected at Washington for Actual Work of Arranging All Preliminary Details.

Minneapolis.—Five banks have just been named in Washington to perfect the organization of the Minneapolis federal reserve bank. They are the Capital National bank, St. Paul; the Merchants National bank, Billings, Mont.; First National bank, Grand Forks, N. D.; First National bank, Lead, S. D.; Commercial National bank, Oshkosh, Wis.

It was not anticipated that any Minneapolis bank would be named for the organization work.

Simultaneous with the naming of five banks in each of the 12 reserve districts for incorporation purposes, comes the announcement by the federal organization committee that the reserve banks will probably be in operation August 1.

One-sixth of the amount of the capital each of the banks named has in the reserve bank will be paid immediately. Another one-sixth will be paid within 90 days and one more sixth within six months.

The organization committee made the following announcement at Washington last night:

"By the end of the month it is hoped that the committee will receive nominations for class A and class B directors and the names of the district reserve electors elected by the subscribing banks so that the vote may be taken early in June. Forms for use in reporting election of district reserve electors and the nominating of candidates will be mailed to the several banks as soon as the organization certificates have been received and filed. Every effort is being made by the committee to expedite this election so that the board of directors of each federal reserve bank may be organized in ample time to elect officers, select employes and banking quarters and to place the banks in actual operation by Aug. 1."

BREWERY LEGAL IN DRY CITY

Fergus Falls Manufacturers Can Sell for Consumption Outside City, Court Says.

Fergus Falls.—Judge Roeser handed down a decision in the district court in this city, holding that the Fergus Brewing company can sell beer in wholesale quantities for consumption outside the city, regardless of the provisions of the city charter.

The city, now dry, operates under a home rule charter which provides that if, after a majority of the voters have voted against license, any person shall within the city limits of the city, in any manner sell or dispose of any intoxicants, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. Under this provision, the brewey management was arrested for selling at wholesale. A fine of $75 was imposed, but the case was carried to the district court to test the city's right to stop the sale.

Judge Roesner holds that the prohibitive clause contravenes the general policy of the state and would result in the virtual confiscation of the brewery company's property. He holds that the brewery company can sell in this city at wholesale to customers who propose to consume the beer outside of the city.

Owatonna Presbyterians Building.

Owatonna.—The Presbyterian society is razing its old church and will build a new edifice on the site. The new building is to cost between $35,000 and $40,000. Reitzel, Dr. Frederic Poole, Chancellor George H. Bradford, former Senator Frank J. Cannon, Governor Robert B. Glenn of North Carolina, Elmer J. Burkett of Nebraska, Julius Caesar Nayphe of Greece, Professor Montraville Woods, former Governor Henry A. Butchel of Colorado, and Father Austin Fleming.

The woman, accompanied by another woman and two native men, was seen in the vicinity of Ogema Sunday afternoon and evening. All were more or less intoxicated.

MUSHROOM IN DEMAND

GOOD PRICE MAKES CULTIVATION WORTH CONSIDERING.

Exercise Great Care in Making First Bed, Using Horse Manure, With a Small Proportion of Long, Strawy Litter.

(By E. KNEELAND, Agriculturist. Copyright, 1914.)

The great demand for mushrooms is not only constant, but far below the supply, and as they sell for from 20 to 60 cents per pound their cultivation is worth considering.

Any one who has a bit of space in the cellar where the temperature can be kept at 57 degrees Fahrenheit can easily raise mushrooms. Make a first bed on the ground in a semi-dark corner, using great care in the selection of material to be used for the bed. Use horse manure, composed largely of short manure, with a small proportion of long, strawy litter, adding loam or rich soil at the rate of one bushel of soil to four or five bushels of manure. This mixture should be prepared by stacking, turning, shaking and restacking every three or four days until it is in condition for preparing the bed. These operations permit of the escape of noxious gases and prevent burning. Keep moist, but not too wet, and in about two weeks the material will be ready for use. The bed should be 12 to 14 inches thick (two to three feet wide, and long as desired) after being thoroughly pounded down so as to become firm, level and compact, and then cover with long straw. If the material is in proper shape the mercury in the thermometer (which comes expressly for this work) will rise to 100 degrees or more, then slowly fall.

When 90 degrees is reached time for planting the spawn has come. If English mushroom spawn is used break it into pieces two inches square and plant nine inches apart each way and two inches deep. Be sure to firm the manure over the spawn, and after the spawn has been planted a week or ten days it should begin "running;" then spread a coat of rich, loamy soil an inch thick over the bed, the surface being made smooth and firm; cover it with litter and keep the temperature at 57 degrees Fahrenheit. The bed should be kept covered until exhausted. Many failures are caused by overwatering. While mushrooms thrive best in a soil which will not crack, but, kept moist enough to press together nicely, still it should not be wet. On the other hand, if allowed to become too dry the bed becomes exhausted before the crop is harvested. Always use lukewarm water. The mushrooms should appear in six or eight weeks unless there is some defect in material, temperature or moisture, in which case they may remain barren for two or three months and then turn out excellent crops.

PLOW SHOE IS QUITE HANDY

Device Shown in Illustration Makes the Task of Moving Cumbersome Implement Easy.

When taking a plow to and from the fields, it is no easy matter. The plow shoe device illustrated makes this much easier, writes Creel Q. Chandler of Darrow, Ia., in the Missouri Valley Farmer. To make it you need a piece of scrap iron one-quarter inch thick, one inch wide and 12 inches long. Bend it as shown in the first diagram, after making a hole in each end. Next take a board 2x10 inches, six feet long, end bore two holes one inch from each side, ten inches from one end, the same size as those in the strap. Bolt the strap firmly to the board, bevel the underside of the front end, and the sled is finished. The plowman stands on the board behind the plow to balance it.

FACTS ABOUT RUNNER DUCKS

Will Produce 200 Eggs Far More Easily Than Any Hen—Proposition for Any Poultryman.

(By L. M. BENNINGTON.)

Among all the openings for making money on the farm, I doubt that there is another to which so many are looking with eager interest and with such real hope as hundreds are giving to the raising of Indian Runner ducks.

This is largely because nearly every farm produces eggs, every family in our land eats eggs, and the Runner is pre-eminently an egg producer.

Given a duck that will lay 200 eggs far more easily than any hen can do it, and the fact that the eggs of the mature bird are one-half larger than those of the average hen, and we have a proposition calculated to make any egg producer sit up and open his eyes, and one which every egg-producer ought to try out to see whether for him the Indian Runner is a better money producer than the hen.

The Haynes motor is built in the Haynes factory. Elwood Haynes, President of the Company—inventor, metallurgist—passes on all metals used in its construction.

The crankshaft, camshaft, cylinders, and, in fact, all vital parts are made by Haynes experts; each part is subjected to the most rigid test and inspection before being built into the car.

All moving parts on the including the pistons, connecting rods, crankshafts and flywheel, are accurately balanced.

The scleroscope is used to test all parts that have been heat-treated, to insure the proper degree of hardness and to detect defective material.

Every magneto, every carburetor, every starting motor and lighting generator—every unit of the car—receives a careful, scrupulous test.

The transmission shafts are mounted on Timken bearings, which give a sturdy construction and reduce friction to the minimum. The axles likewise are designed to overcome friction without sacrificing strength.

The design is so well balanced that the car weighs practically the same at each wheel.

That's why the Haynes develops more than its rated horsepower.

That's why it has unusual hill-climbing ability.

That's why the Haynes has enjoyed uninterrupted success for twenty-one years.

Bill Smith had worked at a certain firm for sixty years.

So the two sons of the employer thought that he had worked for them sufficiently long enough to be pensioned off, and this they decided to do at once.

So they called the old man into the office, and told him that as he had worked for them faithfully and well all these years they had decided to pension him off, but that he could draw the same wage as he was then earning.

The old man turned away, but he was very much troubled and puzzled about the matter, and the two sons could see that he hadn't taken it at all in the spirit in which they had given it, so they said:

"Well, Mr. Smith, what's the matter? Don't you like it?"

"No," replied the old man; "I always thought that this place was a regular shop!"

It requires no scientific training to discover whether coffee disagrees or not.

Simply stop it for a time and use Postum in place of it, then note the beneficial effects. The truth will appear.

"Six years ago I was in a very bad condition," writes a Tenn. lady. "I suffered from indigestion, nervousness and insomnia.

"I was then an inveterate coffee drinker, but it was long before I could be persuaded that it was coffee that hurt me. Finally I decided to leave it off a few days and find out the truth.

"The first morning I left off coffee I had a raging headache, so I decided I must have something to take the place of coffee." (The headache was caused by the reaction of the coffee drug—caffeine.)

"Having heard of Postum through a friend who used it, I bought a package and tried it. I did not like it at first but after I learned how to make it right, according to directions on pkg., I would not change back to coffee for anything.

"When I began to use Postum I weighed only 117 lbs. Now I weigh 170 and as I have not taken any tonic in that time I can only attribute my present good health to the use of Postum in place of coffee.

CITY OF MEXICO PLACE OF TERROR

Medill McCormick Tells Perils Met in Huerta's Capital.

AMERICANS KEPT IN PRISON

Correspondents Are Arrested and Insulted—Trade Is at a Standstill and All Feel Dictator's Government Is Doomed.

By MEDILL M'CORMICK,
Special Correspondent in Mexico of the Chicago Daily News.

Vera Cruz, Mexico, May 12.—Americans are in prison in Mexico City, held incommunicado in places unknown to the Brazilian legation. I do not know how many are so held by the police. When I left Mexico City on a French special train for Puerto Mexico, Walter Whiffen of the Associated Press was under arrest for the second time within 24 hours. Mr. Doster of the International News service was in jail, and so was Mr. Sutton of the Washington Post. An American named Schuler and a locomotive engineer who had returned from Cuba looking for his family were also in prison.

Luis d'Antin, interpreter for the American embassy, dares not leave the precincts of the Brazilian legation, while his wife is afraid to leave the house in which she is hiding. The Mexicans would have taken d'Antin, but for the intervention of the representatives of Argentina, Brazil and Chile, the mediating powers.

Americans Are Not Safe.

The City of Mexico is inarticulate, dazed, afraid. Americans are not safe there and they ought to leave. Other foreigners are alarmed. Mexicans do not speak aloud the names of conspicuous men or of strategically important places. There are Mexican spies everywhere and everywhere they are looking for American spies. The Mexican authorities hold that war exists, but that there is an armistice by virtue of the mediation of the "A.-B.-C." powers. Yet no American is permitted to send a cable message or telegram. I had to get a foreign friend to inform my family and the Daily News of my release a second time and he doubted whether the message had passed the censor.

Press messages by correspondents who are not Americans are censored so that they are valueless. Although Americans are not safe and are forbidden to cable home, they cannot go to the British or German legation for protection. There may be reasons of high diplomacy why Brazil should represent our interests in Mexico, but it is a fact that although he does his best, Senor Cardoso de Oliviera is unable sufficiently to protect our fellow citizens in Mexico City if there be rioting. Even if there is none I am afraid we shall be sorry that the care of American interests was taken out of the hands of Sir Lionel Carden, the British minister.

Suspicion and Menace in Air.

When Richard Harding Davis and I reached Mexico City after our trip from Vera Cruz we went about looking for lodging and food. Suspicion and menace were in the air. Rurales and police with firearms patrolled the streets, which by day were almost as bare of life as by night. Every automobile bore the flag of its owner. Many flags hung from the windows for the protection of the houses and gave the city a sardonic look, like that of a horrid old woman dying with a painted face and decked with finery.

Saturday morning I set about my mission to see certain well-informed foreigners and Mexicans, to bring out of the city the news of conditions which the censor refuses to pass and which, indeed, it would be dangerous for a resident to go about collecting. I saw important members of the French, German and English colonies, as well as Americans. I have reason to believe that no correspondent for weeks has been able to receive such important expressions of opinion.

Huerta Government Doomed.

The Huerta government cannot advance against General Villa, starved as it is for revenue and ammunition, and presently it must fall. How long it can resist Villa's advance is problematical. There is now talk of General Huerta's overthrow by local revolution and of his assassination. I saw him out automobiling. Many people think that he wishes to provoke intervention and that he sent General Navarett toward Vera Cruz for that purpose.

Trade is at a standstill. No freight is moving on the railroads and oil fuel is becoming so scarce that the number of passenger trains has been radically reduced. Control of the Mexican railway has been taken by the government from its English owners. People fear a sacking of the city by the victorious Villa forces or its looting by the mob if General Huerta is killed or overthrown by a local revolution.

They Advocate Intervention.

Thus it happens that some Mexicans and nearly all foreigners now advocate intervention. Everywhere, I asked two questions:

First—"If General Huerta resign and the Carranzistas consent to a compromise, are there enough elements out of which a reasonably representative government can be constituted?"

"Yes," was the answer most frequently given, "if they and the mediating powers give to the United States their moral authorization to intervene. If the Huertistas and Carranzistas refuse to compromise their differences, no."

Second—"Is a single presidential autocrat necessary to the preservation of order in Mexico?"

"No, if a compromise government is assured of American military support in the event of further revolution."

Pessimism Is General.

But none of those with whom I talked was sanguine. All considered compromise possible rather than probable. I shared their pessimism as I went past the battered American club to the beleaguered and worried little Brazilian minister. What hope is there for a people whose government builds an opera house more beautiful than any such building in the British empire or the United States, while the majority of the people have neither letters in their heads nor shoes on their feet?

Henry Rice, who used to live in Chicago, took me to the general of police. We drove past cabmen who looked and dressed like blanket Indians and past officers as smartly uniformed as the French artillery staff. The general gave us permission to leave the city. We hurried pass the boulevarded Y. M. C. A. building to the French special train, on which we had been invited to go to Puerto Mexico, lest the general of police change his mind.

Describes His Experiences.

I do not like to give too much space to our own experiences, but I must relate them in so far as they illustrate conditions and the attitude of the Huertistas toward Americans. Twice we were arrested and once held incommunicado a short time and searched as spies for incriminating documents. Thursday morning Richard Harding Davis, Frederick Palmer and I left Vera Cruz by train for the gap in the railway where the Mexicans cut the track April 22. It is not surprising that we were stopped. It is surprising that two of us got to Mexico City and back again with so little delay.

Palmer has the appearance of an American man of letters. Davis says the farther we advanced into the interior the more I looked like a shaven Uncle Sam. Davis himself looked to me like a mixture of John Drew and Theodore Roosevelt shaken well before using. He and I, anyway, seemed selected for defeat. Adam Weimar, a German-American employed by the Banco National, who started with us from Vera Cruz, did what he could to help us. Davis had letters from the Brazilian consul to his minister in Mexico City. I had a personal letter from the French consul introducing Davis and me to General Maas, while in addition I had a certificate which showed that I represented a great English newspaper. Our credentials, like Mercutio's, were not much, but enough, but Palmer had only a visiting card.

Men Placed Under Arrest.

From the gap we rode by rail to Paso del Macho, where we stopped for luncheon.

It was very hot and the platform was packed with waiting Mexican refugees from Vera Cruz. Suddenly I saw Davis going through the crowd with a shabby little officer at his elbow. As I started to his rescue another officer, still shabbier, tapped me on the arm and invited me to follow him. I did. As the guard closed around us we turned to welcome Palmer's solemn accession to our ranks.

Off to the jail we marched, little sandaled soldiers shuffling along on either side. They drove a crowd of men and women out of the jail court into the jail and asked us for our papers. They read the papers and then offered a chair first to Palmer, not to sit on, but to facilitate the removal of his boots to see if his socks contained dispatches. They searched us, but I politely refused to give up my letter to General Maas, which saved us. I unlimbered my Spanish. They put us in a nice cell and sent for another officer

Sentinel Loads His Gun.

Meanwhile a lieutenant, who looked like a doorkeeper in a "movie" show, put a sentinel over each of us and ostentatiously loaded his gun. Davis said something by way of condolence. "Silencio!" said his sentinel.

So we sat, cross, hot and mum—above all, mum. Presently came a lieutenant who could speak French. I unlimbered that language, too, and out we were sent without a guard. General Maas was very civil. He did not ask Davis or me about our nationality, but Palmer's visiting card would not do. He had to go back to Vera Cruz.

We had no more adventures. A drunken brakeman said he was death on Americans, but if we were English we could give him a few centavos for beer. At Orizaba we spent a comfortable night in a hotel kept by a Frenchman. Friday we left for Mexico City. It was not until we were leaving the railroad station for our hotel in the capital that anything befell us. Then a young man with the manners of a hotel runner stopped us. We discovered that he was a detective.

Accompanied by this man and a half a dozen of his colleagues, we went to the office of the inspector of police. With us went E. T. Oakley, resident correspondent of the London Times, to see us through. There we found Walter Whiffen, who had been confined for twenty-four hours without a bed, linen or sanitary facilities. Sutton also was there. Oakley vouched for us and presently we were taken to the Brazilian legation and after an hour's parley were released upon our agreement to leave the city within twenty-four hours and to send no news by mail or cable during our stay there.

Sick Women Made Well

Reliable evidence is abundant that women are constantly being restored to health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

The many testimonial letters that we are continually publishing in the newspapers—hundreds of them—are all genuine, true and unsolicited expressions of heartfelt gratitude for the freedom from suffering that has come to these women solely through the use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Money could not buy nor any kind of influence obtain such recommendations; you may depend upon it that any testimonial we publish is honest and true—if you have any doubt of this write to the women whose true names and addresses are always given, and learn for yourself.

Read this one from Mrs. Waters:

Camden, N.J.—"I was sick for two years with nervous spells, and my kidneys were affected. I had a doctor all the time and used a galvanic battery, but nothing did me any good. I was not able to go to bed, but spent my time on a couch or in a sleeping-chair, and soon became almost a skeleton. Finally my doctor went away for his health, and my husband heard of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and got me some. In two months I got relief and now I am like a new woman and am at my usual weight. I recommend your medicine to every one and so does my husband."—Mrs. Tillie Waters, 1135 Knight St., Camden, N.J.

And this one from Mrs. Haddock:

Utica, Okla.—"I was weak and nervous, not able to do my work and scarcely able to be on my feet. I had backache, headache, palpitation of the heart, trouble with my bowels, and inflammation. Since taking the Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound I am better than I have been for twenty years. I think it is a wonderful medicine and I have recommended it to others."—Mrs. Mary Ann Haddock, Utica, Oklahoma.

Now answer this question if you can. Why should a woman continue to suffer without first giving Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial? You know that it has saved many others—why should it fail in your case?

For 30 years Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been the standard remedy for female ills. No one sick with woman's ailments does justice to herself if she does not try this famous medicine made from roots and herbs, it has restored so many suffering women to health.

Write to LYDIA E. PINKHAM MEDICINE CO. (CONFIDENTIAL) LYNN, MASS., for advice. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

160 ACRE FARMS IN WESTERN CANADA FREE

400,000 Settlers a Year

Immigration figures show that the population of Canada increased during 1913, by the addition of 400,000 new settlers from the United States and Europe. Most of these have gone on farms in provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Lord William Percy, an English Nobleman, says:

"The possibilities and opportunities offered by the Canadian West are so infinitely greater than those which exist in England, that it seems absurd to think that people should be impeded from coming to the country where they can most easily and certainly improve their position.

New districts are being opened up, which will make accessable a great number of homesteads in districts especially adapted to mixed farming and grain raising.

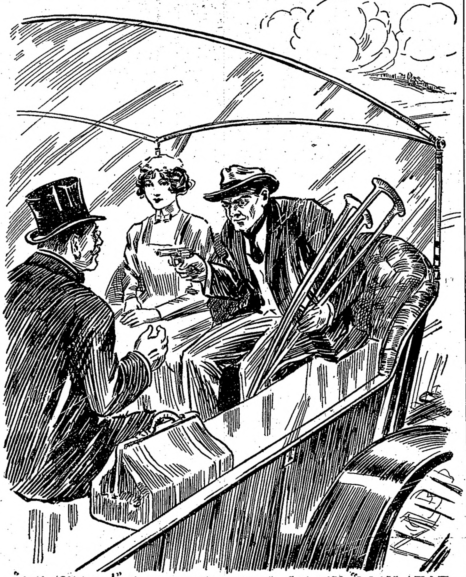
THE DEVIL CHAIR

A Chronicle of the Strange Adventures of John Haynes and His Gyroscope Vehicle

AN INVOLUNTARY ALLY

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman)



"YOU SKUNK!" SAID JOHN HAYNES SOFTLY "LOOK AT ME HARDER. DO YOU REMEMBER ME?"

The discovery of the body of a man lying in the woods, with a bullet from an automatic pistol in the brain, is unfortunately not an event so strange as to call for nation-wide publication. When Grand Valley, N. Y., learned of the discovery, under those conditions, of what had been one of her citizens, the story was featured prominently in all the local papers, for Jack Poole had been a financier and magnate in that remote northern town. But only here and there, scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land, were men who understood the awful portent of this occurrence.

None but they connected it with the appearance of the man in the devil-chair, a vehicle with a gyroscope attachment, running at a prodigious speed, by means of which he had affected a startling robbery in Brooklyn and a still more astonishing escape. The hue and cry for him had now died down. A fickle public had turned to new interests. But these men knew—for Jack Poole had been one of the group whom John Haynes had marked out for vengeance.

Five years before he had been robbed of vast landed interests in a western state by a confederacy of unscrupulous men, aided by a corrupt judge and a bribed lawyer. He had been treacherously wounded, paralyzed, railroaded under an assumed name to the penitentiary at Nokomis Falls. John Haynes had been separated from his wife and daughter. The girl he had found, living upon the bounty of the man Poole, in the belief that both her parents were dead. Haynes rescued her and sent her to Chicago, to await the time when he should summon her to his side. He learned that his wife's whereabouts was known to another of the gang—Chauncey E. Robertson of Benderville, a mushroom township near Nokomis and built on his own lands in the midst of a wilderness of prairie and a jumble of barren hills. After Poole had come to his end through a new attempt at treachery, Haynes resolved to seek out Robertson, discover where his wife was to be found, and execute justice upon him.

It was a feature of the plans which Haynes had formed during the period of his imprisonment that each of his enemies should meet with a fate approximating, as nearly as possible, that which he had meted out to him. He had no further confidence in the law; anonymously he would work, secretly he would devise: and his blow should fall like a lightning bolt out of a blue sky.

But before meting out justice to Robertson, he resolved to consult a physician in order to discover whether or not the crippling paralysis, which rendered his lower limbs useless and was the result of a bullet in the spine, could not be cured.

The instinct of poetic justice induced him to seek out Dr. Adolphus Theobald, formerly of the Nokomis hospital, the man who had tended him when he lay there, awaiting his trial and sentence under the pseudonym, Pete Timmons, a gang leader of the town. Haynes had suspected that his wound could have been cured and, that, in fact, Theobald had been inveigled into the conspiracy of the land gang. Theobald was now in private practice in the city of Nokomis. He did not recognize in the well-dressed, spruce, middle-aged Englishman who hobbled into his consulting room, the wounded man whom he had treated at the hospital five years before. Haynes had rented a furnished cottage on the outskirts, with a private garage in which he stored a rented automobile. Beneath this he had attached the gyroscope, fitting it to a larger wheel. The four wheels of the machine were dummies—for show, but not for use. Upon its single wheel the little machine would run at a hundred and fifty miles, firm as a rock—or as an operating table.

"Cure you?" said Theobald, after he had examined and X-rayed his patient. "Of course I can. It requires only a very trifling operation. You see, Mr.—er—Thompson—" and a vague memory stirred dimly among the forgotten reaches of his brain, did not rise to the level of consciousness: he only experienced a sense of momentary disquietude—"you see, Mr. Thompson, this bullet which you say the crazed workman fired at you two years ago reached the spine but did not penetrate it. It is, at present, pressing upon an important nerve center which controls the movements of the lower limbs. To remove it by a simple incision will be no danger at all."

John Haynes was sure then that Theobald had been bribed by the confederates; that he had left the bullet in the wound purposely, to cripple him.

"I cannot understand why the physician who attended you did not remove that bullet," Theobald added with a puzzled face. "In Mexico, you say? That must account for it. In our country no doctor would hesitate to operate for a moment."

"I'll think the matter over," said Haynes, in order to arouse Theobald's expectations of a fat fee, and he went to the nearest telegraph office. From there he sent a message to his daughter in Chicago. "Be here on Friday morning next," he wired. "I will meet you at the station at 10 a. m. It is an important case. You had better travel in your nurse's uniform." That was all, but he knew that Eleanor would understand. On the Friday she reached Nokomis, dressed as a nurse, her suitcase in her hand.

John Haynes had affixed his dummy wheels, and the automobile took them to his cottage. There he outlined the case. He was amazed at Eleanor's self-possession. The timid girl, ignorant of the ways of the world outside her little circle at Grand Valley, had become inflamed by his schemes of vengeance; not only the sense of loyalty to her father, so strangely restored to her, but the desire to avenge his wrongs and to discover her mother had come to dominate her entire being. She learned his plan and she pronounced it good.

"You see, my dear," John Haynes explained, hobbling to his chair beside the fireplace, "this Theobald is an unprincipled scoundrel, and doubtless he will not hesitate, under fear of betrayal, to turn on his former allies. I have made inquiries and understand that they have given him a number of shares in the land company. He is rich and respected. If his past, which he thinks forgotten, should rise up and threaten him, he would stick at no scruples. At the same time it is necessary to frighten him thoroughly and to impress him with our power, so as to prevent the possibility of renewed treachery."

On the next day, Haynes returned to Dr. Theobald.

"I've been thinking over the matter and I have decided to undergo that operation," he said. "You guarantee that there will be no danger?"

"Absolutely none," the doctor answered. "You ought to have been operated on long ago. That physician in Mexico who treated you, Mr. Thompson, was criminally ignorant. I say this without hesitation."

"Good," said John Haynes. "But you must operate at my home."

"You will require a nurse," he said.

"I have one at my house," answered the Englishman. "She is very competent."

"Then how would Monday morning suit you?" suggested Theobald blandly. "My anesthetist and I can be there at nine o'clock."

"No anesthetist will be needed," Haynes answered. "My nurse who attends me is amply competent to administer ether."

"But I shall need her assistance during the operation. Of course it could be done. But—"

"Dr. Theobald," said John Haynes, smiling, "I prefer to have my own nurse administer the ether. You said the operation will be a slight one, and I would rather place myself in her care than under that of any assistant of yours."

"O, very well," answered Theobald shortly, mentally adding a hundred dollars on his bill. "Of course it can be done. It may take a little longer, though."

"How long?"

"Forty-five minutes."

"And now about the anesthetic. How long will it take me to come out from under its influence?"

"Well, usually a patient who is not heavily anesthetized begins to recover consciousness as soon as the mask is removed, that is to say, as soon as he is off the table. But of course, a certain amount of stupor exists for—well, perhaps for several hours."

"But a patient could be aroused from it?"

"O, undoubtedly. He would feel very sick, but he would be conscious, I might say, within a few minutes after the operation is ended—always provided that the anesthetization was not unduly heavy. Our practice nowadays is to keep the patient just sufficiently anesthetized to destroy the sense of pain; the administration of the ether is suspended during the operation until he begins to show signs of consciousness; then a few more drops are poured over the mask, and so on. In this way the mortality has been reduced to—well, practically eliminated."

"I understand," said Haynes. "Then on Monday at eight-thirty we shall be at your door in the automobile."

"But, my dear sir," said Theobald, surprised, "you will have to be waiting for me in bed. There are certain preparations necessary."

"My nurse can attend to that. Will I not be as safe after an automobile ride as before?"

Theobald began to think his patient crazy. Mentally he added fifty dollars more; if he were insane he should at least pay for his whims.

"Well," he said, laughing, "of course we should have to sterilize your back all over again. But still, so long as you don't eat any breakfast, I don't see how a ride could hurt you."

John Haynes rose up. He had learned all that he needed to know. "At eight-thirty, then," he answered. "Good-by, Dr. Theobald. I hope that our enterprise on Monday morning will be highly successful."

Theobald watched him leave the room with a bewildered look. "Now where have I seen that man before?" he muttered to himself. "I know his face." But he had known many faces, and by the time the door of the house had closed behind the Englishman Theobald had ceased to search in the amber-room of his brain. There were so many things that he did not care to investigate.

On Monday morning the automobile was waiting outside Theobald's house promptly at the time appointed. Inside were the patient and a trim-looking nurse. The doctor gazed at her in some wonder. She seemed too young to be a trained nurse. But her get-up was irreproachable, and he was entirely indifferent to her abilities. Had she not been certificated he would not have cared. Since Saturday he had altered his prospective fee from three hundred to seven hundred and fifty; he could always cut it down afterward if his patient objected; but he would not be likely to object, since he had never broached the subject of fees. Theobald hopped into the machine with his instrument case and patted his companion on the back cheerily.

"There's no danger, Mr. Thompson," he said heartily. "Don't be afraid."

"I'm not afraid," retorted Haynes grimly. "I hope you will not be."

The other laughed. "I'm not likely to be," he said. "By the way, what make of machine is this? I never saw anything like it. She must be on springs, but she runs so smoothly—why, I could almost perform an operation here."

"I'll give you a chance—perhaps," said Thompson, smiling, and turned abruptly toward the poorer region of the town, beside the freight station, edging the wilderness. Theobald was now convinced that his patient was mad. He looked at the nurse inquiringly, but she sat silently in the tonneau and ignored his professional "signals." He felt a momentary pang of uneasiness, too, at the course the machine was taking—for he feared that he might have overestimated his patient's wealth. Certainly this quarter of the town was not inhabited by the wealthier citizens of Nokomis.

However, he breathed more freely when the machine swung out from the town and along the roadway which bordered the railroad tracks. Soon they were in the midst of the prairie. Undoubtedly, then, Mr. Thompson possessed a house on the outskirts—one of those new residential mansions, doubtless, which were springing up everywhere in the vicinity. Of course—and that was why he had thoughtfully brought his automobile for him. He smiled at his thoughts and brought up his bill to its original figure again.

Then, when Nokomis was out of sight behind a hummock of sand, the machine ran down the railroad embankment in a surprising fashion, traveling as though on level ground. Theobald saw his companion turn and fidget with a spring. He looked down; two wheels lay on the ground! He grasped the seat in terror.

"Mr. Thompson—Mr. Thompson," he gasped, "you've lost two wheels!"

"Four," answered John Haynes calmly, and the two others fell, rolled, detached, for a considerable distance and settled down beside the metals. The car stood steady as—

As that which automatically detached itself from the opposite side and folded downward, at the touch of a spring, to meet the seat on which they sat. It was a smooth glass shelf.

"Your operating table," said John Haynes grimly, and the car moved forward and gently balanced itself upon a single rail; then began to run forward at about twenty miles an hour. Theobald attempted to spring from it; instantly the speed increased to thirty, forty, fifty—seventy-five. The machine bowled along on its rail, without a jolt or jar. Theobald might have thought it to be stationary, but for the whirl of objects that spun past them.

While he sat there aghast, John Haynes rose on his crutches, drew up the wind-shield, pressed another spring, and then the machine became an air-tight case of glass, save for a ventilator overhead. John Haynes sat down and put his hand to his hip; Theobald found himself looking into the muzzle of a pistol.

"You skunk!" said John Haynes softly. "Look at me harder. Do you remember me?"

"Pete Timmons!" gasped the doctor, the name flashing into his mind for the first time since he had sold his patient's body for fifty shares of stock in the Nokomis Land company.

"Yes, Pete Timmons," answered Haynes. "What have you to say? You have convicted yourself!"

Dr. Theobald, whirling along that narrow line in the car with his victim, felt a horror steal through his soul. Encased in glass, helpless, at this man's mercy, he might have been suffering in an inferno such as the earlier medicos had depicted as the penalty for those who broke the hippocratic oath which they had taken.

"I don't know what to say," he pleaded. "You won't take my life? Before God, I swear I can cure you. It was so terrible a temptation, just to leave the bullet beside the spine and get—"

"Yes, how much did you sell out for?"

"Five thousand dollars," the doctor answered.

"Theobald," said Haynes, lowering the pistol because he saw that the man was incapable of further resistance, "you are one of the least of the scoundrels who railroaded an innocent man to prison to get his millions. How much you knew, I do not want to know. You will do two things, and in the consideration for these your life and reputation shall be spared. First, you will operate on me."

"Yes, yes," urged Theobald eagerly. "Turn around and I will go straight to your house with you."

"Second," continued Haynes, "when I summon you, you will be at my disposal. Later I shall have need of you."

"I agree," cried the doctor, wringing his hands in fear. "But for heaven's sake, let us turn back and begin the operation."

"No, no, Dr. Theobald," answered the other. "You will operate here."

"Here?" gasped the doctor.

"Here. This seat on which you are seated is also of glass. The two together make a very practicable operating table. It is a little short for the legs—but, as you see, my legs are without sensation. Under this seat are bottles containing alcohol and bichloride of mercury for sterilizing purposes. Under the other are basins, physicians' sponges, and two gallons of distilled water, which can be boiled on an electric heater. You can wash your hands here, sterilize your instruments, operate and administer ether—which you have brought, I presume, in that bag of yours." Then, overcome by his smoldering resentment, he grasped the doctor with his strong right hand. "You dog," he shouted in his ear, "do you suppose I will give you a second chance to betray me; that I will place myself in your hands, to lie helpless at your mercy?

"No, Doctor, this time you will work as you never worked before, for the sake of your life and mine. This car is mounted on a gyroscope wheel and is traveling now at seventy-three miles an hour. It is going so fast that track-walkers along this line will be unable to distinguish it from one of those little machines on which line superintendents are apt to move from station to station. If they can so distinguish it, it will not matter in the least, for I am now going to increase the speed to just double the amount—one hundred and forty-six, nominally one hundred and fifty."

He looked at his watch. "It is now nine fifteen," he said. "The track will be clear until ten-thirty, when we shall encounter the transcontinental express at Buffalo Ford. My computation is exact. No one but I knows the mechanism by which this car can be stopped. You will, therefore, proceed with your operation and bring me out of the ether in time for me to stop the car before the train bears down on us. If you succeed you shall be dropped near Buffalo Ford, from which point you can, no doubt, find your way homeward. If you fail, we three will be ground to death under the wheels of the trans-continental. Do you agree to operate?"

Theobald looked despairingly into the resolute face of the man whom he had betrayed. He looked at the nurse, seated quietly at his head and seeing that she remained impassive, nodded in token of acquiescence.

For the first time Eleanor spoke. "I am no nurse," she said. "I am his daughter. You must instruct me in the application of the ether."

Theobald nodded again. And now, to the credit of the man, be it said, the professional sense awoke in him and his fears vanished. The novelty of the situation, the difficulties to be overcome and perhaps a sense of shame and regret co-operated in his resolution to make the operation successful. Seated in that cage of glass, as though in an unshaken room, while trees flew past at intervals and the brown walls of the railroad embankment appeared as walls blurred, indistinguishable walls, creating the illusion of an actual room—he deftly prepared his patient. He boiled the water, scrubbed his hands and donned his sterilized rubber gloves. When his instruments were boiling, he gave Eleanor the ether cone and mask and quickly instructed her in the use of them. And as John Haynes quietly composed himself upon the glass table, his daughter leaned over him saturating the mask until her father's breathing became stertorous and he sank into sleep, watching him and pouring on the fluid from time to time, at the first quiver of his limbs, with calm faith in the success of the outcome.

She did not faint or even turn her eyes away when the doctor set to his task. It was only afterward that the revulsion came.

Presently it was ended and the wound bound and the clothing adjusted once again over the antiseptic bandages. Then, for the first time, Theobald remembered the danger of his predicament. During that long hour he had worked swiftly, as a surgeon must, and deftly as befits one trained; but he had not hastened nor imperiled his patient's life because, miles distant, but ever bearing down toward them with dreadful speed, the transcontinental express was rushing from coast to coast upon those lines of steel. But now, when all was ended, Theobald tore his watch from his pocket and looked at it. Ten twenty. What if the express should be in advance of time? What if the distance had been miscalculated? What if the gyroscope, untended during that hour, had increased speed? He glanced at the indicator; the car was running steadily at a hundred and fifty miles. Then he set to arouse his patient. One minute passed. Two passed—there was no response, and, with white face and features sternly set, John Haynes remained motionless. Three minutes. They chafed his hands. An eyelid quivered, a tremor ran through his frame. Four minutes: he raised his head, opened his eyes, muttered and relapsed into a more easy slumber. Five minutes. The train was due.

John Haynes opened his eyes again. Eleanor's voice in his ear brought back that soul, hovering upon the confines of the misty borderland.

"Father! The train! Wake! Wake Touch the spring!"

Why had he not confided to her that secret? It was the impulse of the man, born from long confinement in the penitentiary, to be sparing of words and self-restrained. Perhaps he had feared that Theobald might wring the secret from his daughter's lips if he had told.

He had sunk back to sleep again. They looked round desperately for the spring and could not find it. The train might be delayed—one minute or five. But, traveling at that fearful rate, the gyroscopic car was eating up the miles. Even in his predicament Theobald's brain worked at the mathematical computation. One hundred and fifty in sixty minutes: two and a half miles each minute. He snatched at his watch again; it was seven and twenty minutes to eleven. Haynes must wake speedily or—

He dashed his face with alcohol, raised him and shook him. Hayne's eyes opened again. A name was on his lips. Eleanor bent her ear to catch the word; it was her mother's name.

And by the power of that name, repeated softly by the daughter, the sleeping man awoke. Consciousness, struggling back, this time had come to stay. John Haynes peered out through the glass windows, and suddenly he understood. A look of horror passed over his face.

"Raise me!" he murmured. "Put the steering wheel in my hands."

"No, no, father; the spring—the secret spring!"

Now he understood fully. He signed to them to turn him on his side. From the uplifted seat of the machine he pulled a pin, cleverly concealed; he pressed it back, pulled it forth, pressed it. The speed slackened. The blurred wall resolved itself again into an embankment. The hand traversed the indicator in a retrograde direction. One hundred, ninety, eight, seventy. . . .

Through the glass wind-shield, very far distant, Theobald saw a monster crawling over the flat prairie land.

Sixty, fifty. It was necessary to slow to thirty before the car could leave the rail. Traveling at a higher speed, the jolt from the smooth metal to the depressed roadbed, set irregularly with sleepers, would have shattered the car. Forty—the indicator ceased to move. That tiny thing was now a rushing serpent, coursing toward them with terrific fury. If they should meet it would annihilate them and then sweep on as though the car had never existed. The indicator hand was moving again. Haynes closed his eyes in weariness. But Eleanor had grasped the steering wheel.

With a bound that shook them from their seats the car left the metals. It raced over the sleepers, not quivering, but tossing them and deftly catching them again, as might some sprightless, wheelless wagon of palaeolithic men. Then the embankment quivered, the air was filled with sound, and the black cars of the train tore past them.

Five minutes later Theobald dismounted two miles from Buffalo Ford. Haynes grasped him by the hand.

"You have fulfilled the first part of your task," he said. "Hold yourself ready, for soon I shall call on you to complete your reparation. Good-bye."

He woke from sleep hours later at the cottage which had been prepared for his convalescence, so far away that none could have traced them. As Eleanor helped him within, John Haynes uttered an exclamation of pain, which changed to joy.

"Be careful, dear," he said. "You struck my foot against that door—I felt the blow."

Continent Is Rising in Spots and Sinking Elsewhere

WASHINGTON.—Most people know in a general way that large portions of the United States have in the past been covered by the ocean, but it is perhaps not so generally known that the continent is now rising in some places and sinking in others. There is every reason to believe that minor movements of the land are constantly taking place.

??
CONTINENT RISING IN SPOTS AND SINKING IN OTH

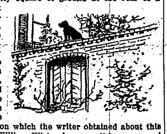
Not so very long ago, in a geologic sense, the Hudson river flowed through a deep canyon or gorge at New York city. Soundings show that this gorge extends through the harbor and far out to sea. It is evident that the land surface has been lowered in this region, allowing the ocean to creep in on the land, fill the old river channel, and in places wholly submerge it. The submergence of the land was greater at one time than it is now. In excavations for some of the New York skyscrapers remains of oysters and other salt-water animals have been found. As a rule the only available knowledge in regard to the former submergence of an area is derived from the marine shells and other animals found in deposits laid down by the sea. By the nature of the fossils geologists are able to tell approximately when the ocean invaded the land. They have found evidence of a submergence of much greater magnitude and much older than that which now floods the Hudson valley.

Gothamites and others need not, however, feel alarmed at this statement of the ups and downs of the continent, for while geologically this submergence is not so very old, the geologist thinks and speaks in terms of thousands if not millions of years.

In the course of its investigations of the geology of the country the United States geological survey has been making a study of the cretaceous deposits of the eastern states and has found that the ocean of that time covered much of what is now the Atlantic coastal plain, while the Gulf of Mexico spread widely over the central southern states, probably reaching as far north as Cairo, Ill.

Mysterious Stone Dog Over Gate on 18th Street

MEN and women, as well as children, who pass along Eighteenth street south of F. are often attracted by a stone dog above a gate which pierces an old brick wall inclosing half a city square of ground at the rear of a grand, but decayed, dun-colored brick house that is four stories and basement high. The writer has made a number of inquiries concerning the history of this house, but the information obtained has been contradictory and otherwise unsatisfactory. There is no doubt as to its great age, as great age is measured in Washington, the capital of a new country, and there is also no doubt that at some time within a century this house was one of the great and imposing homes of Washington. One bit of information which the writer obtained about this house was that it was the home of William Wirt, who was attorney general in the cabinet of President Jackson. The writer was not told that Wirt was the builder of the house, and it appears to have been built before the time of Jackson's administration.

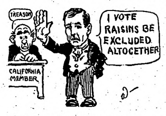


For a long time the house has been occupied by the bureau of insular affairs, or by a part of that bureau, and the last time the reporter passed there a neighbor said that the house was to be torn down and a large and costly government building constructed on its site and over the ground at the rear, which bears traces of once having been a fine garden.

The dog statue is that of a hunter. He is a setter, and he appears to be looking from his place on the wall above the gate at one of the windows at the back of the old house. It may be the effigy of a pet hunting dog which belonged to one of the early tenants of the house, or it may be an architectural fancy.

Has No Fond Recollection of Plum Puddings

REPRESENTATIVE PHIL CAMPBELL of Kansas evidently has no fond recollection of the plum puddings of his boyish days on the old farm back in the Grasshopper state. When the tariff on raisins was lowered the members from California predicted every disaster the human race could know from measles to earthquakes. The raisin was a sacred institution, the temple of liberty, the fire upon the family altar.



TREASON
I VOTE RAISINS BE EXCLUDED ALTOGETHER
CALIFORNIA MEMBER

In fact, no one of the raisin breed could have recognized himself in the glowing picture painted by the orators from the Golden state. The raisin, like the flag and the mint julep, followed the Constitution, and only the lowest of poltroons would dare cast a shadow on its time-honored name. Campbell rose in his seat in the house and unbosomed himself.

"Gentlemen," he said with tears in his trembling voice, "if the raisins of today are like those I used to eat in plum pudding in my bare-legged youth back in my state, I vote raisins be excluded altogether!"

Uncle Sam Solves the Fuzzy Hair Mystery

THE department of agriculture has made a discovery. Some of the false curls the girls are wearing are made of goat hair. And braving the wrath of the fair sex, Secretary Houston's experts give the whole thing away in a bulletin issued the other day on the Angora goat.

GIRLS ARE WEARING CURLS MADE OF GOAT'S HAIR SAYS UNCLE SAM

"Formerly," the department bulletin says, "the use of mohair depended so largely upon the prevailing fashion that its price varied widely from year to year. This condition is rapidly changing, as new uses for mohair are continually found, from automobile tops and table covers to dress goods and curled false hair, and today the grower is assured of a reasonably steady market."

Mohair, it may be explained, is the trade name for the fleece of the Angora goat.

The Angora, department experts declare, is the best animal to raise, because he "works and pays for his board at the same time." He does this by helping to clear away the brush from land, will eat weeds and any other refuse about the place, and is invaluable in "cleaning-up" week about the farm or ranch.

"In 1881," the department bulletin adds, "the sultan of Turkey endeavored to preserve for his dominions the monopoly of the mohair trade by prohibiting the exportation of the live animals. But it was too late. Some of the best blood was already in America, and today other countries are buying of us."

"JUST PLAIN OLD INDIAN"

By common report General Huerta, Mexico's present dictator, is much given to convivial pursuits. His prowess with the cognac bottle is much lauded, but how much truth there may be in this gossip is hard to tell. One hears all sorts of stories, says an American close to the Mexican dictator, but it is a serious question whether his alleged devotion to the bottle ever interferes seriously with his mental processes or with his work.

Save for his poor eyesight he looks physically fit. Probably he is much more robust and active mentally and bodily than the average American approaching sixty. Huerta is nearly that age. He has led an outdoor life, working hard, sleeping long and eating simple food. Indeed, he eats whatever is set before him and seems to assimilate it. One who sat near him recently at a banquet noticed that every cover as it left his place was bare except for the bones. He appeared to be as valiant with the trencher as with the cup.

"I'm just a plain old Indian," is a phrase of which Huerta is fond in allusions to himself and his democratic tastes. He vaunted that humble origin not long since at a banquet to which the fashionable Jockey club invited him.

"A few weeks ago I couldn't have got inside this place," he said to his entertainers. "There has been no change in me. I am the same old Indian that I was. Yet now you let me sit down and drink champagne with you as if you thought me as good as you are."

The Jockey club hosts laughed feebly, as though they didn't quite see the joke.

HOW HUDDLESTON GOT THE JOB

"I heard you people wanted to hire a congressman, so have come down to see if I can get the job."

He got it.

This is how George Huddleston applied for Oscar Underwood's job as congressman from the Ninth Alabama district, and the manner of application and the results are characteristic of Huddleston. He is as unlike Underwood as a gatling gun is unlike a silk hat.

Underwood is a large man physically, temperamentally reserved, suave and polished of manner, and rather distinguished in appearance.

Huddleston is a little, frail-looking man, without social gloss, and utterly lacking in the physical characteristics that are supposed to adorn those of his aggressive, fighting temperament.

When Underwood wants anything he proceeds cautiously, pulling a wire here and there; a string there, eventually landing what he started out to get. When Huddleston wants anything he goes after it like he went after the job as congressman. So far he has always brought home the bacon.

Huddleston is forty-four years old and has the proverbial advantage of having been born in the country.

AFTER A SECOND SENATORIAL TERM

© HARRIS & EWING

Fine, bluff Marcus Aurelius Smith, senator from Arizona, has gone home for a short session of stirring up things and is making sure of a second senatorial term. He was given the short term when Arizona placed her star on the flag, but it was understood that honorable Mark would eventually benefit with a full term during the period of Democratic ascendency in the new state—a state that owes more to Mark Smith than any other single citizen within her borders for his efforts as delegate to accomplish statehood and make it possible to have senators.

For some sixteen years Mark Smith was delegate in congress from Arizona without a vote, but powerful otherwise, especially when the boundless West was interested in legislation. In all the years of the Honorable Mark in congress there was confidence among his friends that he would some day come back as senator, and he did not disappoint them. As usual, some ambitious Democrats have been busy during the senator's attention to senatorial duties and have announced their ambition to succeed him as senator. While Mark was not alarmed, he thought it the part of wisdom to look things over.

NOT AFTER ANOTHER TERM

James Francis Burke, ever vigilant, aggressive, industrious, also debonair, startled his congressional associates by announcing that he would not ask another term this year. The Hon. James Francis has had five terms from the most populous Pittsburgh district, which stood firmly for the Republican faith in both distressing campaigns of 1910 and 1912.

The Burke way of handling things in campaign years and between times had much to do with keeping his small, compact part of the Pennsylvania map loyal to the Republican party and there may be some wonder that a young member so sure of return should prepare to drop out. Burke explains it in these words:

"Despite importunities I have positively refused to again return to congress. Ten years is enough for any one unless he determines to make politics the sole object of his career. The time to quit is when you are strong, and in my case, business has attained such proportions as to demand my undivided attention."

Tales of GOTHAM and other CITIES

Strange Garb Startles San Francisco Dancers

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—The last Monday night affair of the Impromptu club, an exclusive dancing organization, whose members comprise men prominent in the business and financial world, and their wives, was marked by an incident which will live long in the memory of those who attended.

I COULD T-T-TEAR THE GUY L-L-LIMB FROM LIMB THAT STOLE MY COAT

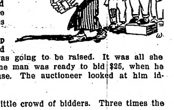
When the wooing of Terpsichore through the medium of the tango, was at its height the gay revelers were startled by the appearance of a figure, which, after some moments of investigation, developed into that of Rearden T. Lyons, clubman and star billiardist, and known in the realms of business as the manager of the Frank Wood trust. Lyons was attired in an array of garments far removed from the conventional dress. Over his glistening white shirt he wore a ragged jumper, many sizes too big for him, and the hat, which he doffed, was a strange relic of a past dynasty.

It appeared that earlier in the evening he told his wife over the phone that he would go to the club direct, making up for the period which he would occupy in the overrush of work, with his six-cylinder. En route, in the vicinity of California and Montgomery streets, a tire went flat, and the clubman, removing his overcoat, in which he had just invested $65, and one of those thoroughly up-to-the-minute green kelties—and making the customary remarks—was soon busily engaged in remedying the puncture.

While this was going on a waif of the night slunk upon the scene and made himself the possessor of the o'ercoatings and the hat. Rearden had to get to the club, at least in time to escort his wife home, and so in one of those lofty buildings down in "the street," he petitioned a friendly janitor to help him out.

Widow Buys House at Auction Sale for $3.50

KANSAS CITY, MO.—A picturesque group of men and women gathered on a hillside near Thirty-first street and Colorado avenue the other morning. They were there for house bargains the city auctioned off to make way for the extension of Linwood boulevard.



M. Stern, as the auctioneer, represented the majesty of the law. A wave of his arm and a deal was made.

Perhaps one of the most interesting sales was that made to Mrs. Mattie Price, a "squatter," who lives in a shack near Thirty-first street and Brighton avenue. She bought a house for $3.50. She is a widow and lives alone in her little hillside home.

When M. Stern put the house up for a bid she offered $3.50. She looked apprehensively to see if her bid was going to be raised. It was all she could afford to pay for a home. One man was ready to bid $25, when he noticed his competitor for the house. The auctioneer looked at him inquiringly.

"No, I don't want it," he said.

That was the sentiment of the little crowd of bidders. Three times the auctioneer called for higher bids, but got no response.

"Sold," the auctioneer finally said, and the old woman's face beamed as she handed him the money.

"What are you going to do with the house?" Mrs. Price was asked.

"A man is going to move it for me over there on the hill," she answered, pointing eastward. "He isn't going to charge me anything for the work. You see, I haven't a lot, so I'll put it where anyone will let me. I live alone, as my husband died of heart disease several years ago."

Mrs. Price did not know how old she was. "Pretty near fifty," she believed. She looked to be well past seventy years.

Wandering Girl of Eighteen Is Taken as a Vagrant

ST. LOUIS, MO.—Marie Smith, eighteen years old, of Monica, Ill., described by the police as a "girl hobo," was a few days ago held in the central district matron's room while her only outfit of clothing was being washed.

GUESS I'LL HEV TER PINCH YER FUR BEIN' A VAG'

The matron sent a garment at a time to the laundry in a progressive effort to improve the girl's personal appearance so that she might look for work without being arrested as a vagrant.

Miss Smith was taken in custody at Union station at 1:15 a. m., after she had alighted from a Frisco passenger train. One of the station ushers, who noticed that she had no baggage and that her clothing was soiled and wrinkled, asked her where she was going. "Up on Olive street," she replied. The usher called a policeman, who took her to central district station. There the young woman told the police that she was one of eight children and that her mother, a widow, found it hard to support the family.

"Two years ago I decided to start out and look for work," she said. "I walked twenty-nine miles to Peoria and worked in a laundry there about four months. Then one night I crawled into a box car and beat my way to Chicago. After staying there eight months I came to St. Louis."

Naming of Babies Reduced to an Exact Science

NEW YORK.—Names are no longer to be applied by chance. Mother and father should not argue whether the little "what is it" is to be plain "John" or "Clarence De Puyster." Mrs. Aso-Neith-Neypa-Cochran has it all reduced to an exact science. She is:

X-Y
DE PEYSTER

"The Author, Founder and Teacher of the Aso-Neith Cryptogram; a Science of Numbers and Letters."

So her business cards. To a caller in her University Heights flat Mrs. Cochran explained it all. The sexes are suspended between the nebulous peaks of the two externities by a certain geometrical sign or symbol. This sign is expressed by a digit number.

The digit numbers exclude nine, said Mrs. Cochran, for nine is simply a number one with a zero riding on its back. Nine begins and ends a cycle.

You see? My, how stupid!

Every digit has its own individuality, characteristic and temperamental musical tone. Find the tone and learn your being.

Life harmony consists in adjusting one's being, one's cosmic urges to vibrations which give forth a concord instead of a discord. If the vibration number of your name and your birth date form a harmony—if they coalesce—you'll be happy. If they form a discord you will be wretched while others are gay.

Mrs. Cochran looked fairly happy—and prosperous. She evidently was in harmony. She said she could find a name for anybody and was naming thousands of children every year.

FRANCISCO VILLA, MASTER OF CRIME

Bloody Career of—Carranza's Chief General.

MURDERER AND PLUNDERER

Starting as a Cattle Thief, He Has Run the Criminal Gamut—Massacres of Prisoners and Non-Combatants.

Gen. Francisco Villa, leader of the constitutional forces in northern Mexico, is more frequently in the public eye than the Spaniard, Carranza, whom he is presumed to serve. His press bureau is far more active and his dash as a commander gives to him importance as a news maker, overshadowing for the time being the trail of murder, plunder and outrage which maps his field of operation.

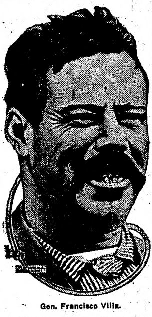
Murder, plunder and outrage are Villa's specialties. He was reared that way, and increasing opportunities have made him a master hand in the business. To Americans his career is worth studying in connection with his published appeal to the United States to raise the embargo on war material and the certainty that with constitutionalist success he will sit close to if not actually in the presidential chair of Mexico.

Villa's Start in Life.

A biography of Villa compiled by the Boston Transcript and read by Senator Lodge in the United States senate supplies the following facts:

Francisco Villa was born at Las Nieves in the state of Durango about the year 1868. He is wholly uneducated, being unable to read and barely able to sign his name. About the year 1882, when only fourteen years of age, he was sentenced to a term of imprisonment for cattle stealing. On his discharge he settled in the mining camp of Guanacevi, where a few months later he underwent another sentence of imprisonment for homicide. When he came out of prison for the second time he organized a band of robbers, which had their headquarters in the mountainous region of "Perico" in the state of Durango, and were the terror of all that district.

In the year 1907 he was in partnership with one Francisco Reza, stealing cattle in Chihuahua and selling them in the United States, and then stealing mules and horses in the United States, and selling them in Chihuahua. In consequence of some disagreement he shot and killed Reza in broad daylight, while sitting in the plaza in the City of Chihuahua. During the early part of November, 1910, he attacked the factory of a Mr. Soto, in Allende, state of Chihuahua, and killed the owner. By threatening the latter's daughter he forced her to show where she had hidden a sum of $11,000, which he stole and used for arming a considerable force. He then joined Madero's revolution, uniting his band with Urbina's column. In January, 1911, he was at Casas Grandes, Chihuahua, where he killed Carlos Alatorre and Luis Oritz for refusing to pay him the money he demanded for their ransom. At Batopilas, state of Chihuahua, in February of the same year he tortured a lady named Senora Maria de la Luz Gomez until he made her pay him $30,000. She died from the effects of the barbarous treatment she received.



Gen. Francisco Villa.

Outrages at Juarez.

When Ciudad Juarez was taken from the federals in May, 1913, he killed Senor Ignacio Gomez Oyola, a man of over sixty years of age, under the following circumstances: Having sent for him, Villa asked whether he had any arms in his house, and on saying he had not, Villa, "who was seated on a table," drew his revolver and shot him dead. After rifling the corpse of money and valuables it was thrown into the street.

After the triumph of the revolution, Villa, in November, 1911, obtained a monopoly from the then governor of Chihuahua for the sale of meat in the city of Chihuahua, which he procured by stealing cattle from the neighboring farms. Suspecting one of his subordinates, Cristobal Juarez, of stealing on his own account, he killed him one night in the latter part of November in the Calle de la Liberadad.

In the early part of May, 1913, Villa with 75 men, assaulted a train at Baeza, state of Chihuahua, that was carrying bars of gold and silver valued at 100,000 pesos, killing the crew and several passengers, including Messrs. Caravantes and a Senor Isaac Herrero of Ciudad Guerrero.

Murders in Cold Blood.

Late in the same month he entered the town of San Andres, Chihuahua, and assaulted the house of Senor Sabas Murga an haciendado, who, with his two sons, tried to defend themselves. Two of his nephews were killed, but the Murgas got away. Villa than got hold of two sons-in-law of Murga who had not taken any part in the fight, and after torturing them to say where their father-in-law had hidden his money, he had them killed.

Towards the end of the month Villa's band took the town of Sta. Rosalia, Chihuahua, shooting all prisoners and treating the principal officers with terrible cruelty. Colonel Pueblecita was shot and his body dragged along the streets of the town. The commercial houses of Messrs, Visconti, Sarli, Cia Harinera, Sordo y Blanco (Spaniards) and many others were totally sacked. Many private persons were murdered, one of the worst cases being that of a Spaniard, Senor Montilla, cashier of the house of Cordo y Blanco, who was shot over the head of his wife, who tried to defend him. Villa personally kicked her in the face as she lay on the dead body of her husband. He also himself killed a Senor Ramos, secretary of the court of first instance.

Massacre at Casas Grandes.

In July, 1913, Villa took Casas Grandes, Chihuahua, and shot more than 80 noncombatants, violating several young girls, amongst them two young ladies named Castillo.

He attacked and took the town of San Andres, which was held by the federals, in September, 1913, shooting many peaceable residents and more than 150 prisoners, many of these being women and children. In shooting these people, in order to economize cartridges, he placed one behind the other up to five at one time, very few of them being killed outright. The bodies of the dead and wounded were then soaked with petroleum and thrown into bonfires prepared for the purpose. The prisoners were forced themselves to make the bonfire and cover with petroleum the rest of the victims.

After this he went to the small town of Carretas, where he took prisoner a man of more than seventy years of age, named Jose Dolores Moreno, demanding from him a ransom of $200. As he could not pay Villa killed him with his own hand.

All His Prisoners Shot.

On September 29, 1913, Villa, having overpowered a force of over 500 federals commanded by General Alvirez at Aviles, fifteen kilometers from Torreon, had every prisoner shot.

Villa has shot in Chihuahua 150 noncombatants, the greater number being poor people who could not leave for want of means or because they thought they ran no risks, as they took no part in politics, for all the people in any way connected with the government had left before Villa entered the city. Special mention may be made of the case of Senor Ignacio Irigoyen and Senor Jose A. Yanez, who, though in no way connected with politics, were taken by Villa and tortured for several days with threats to shoot them until they paid ransoms of $20,000 each. Having obtained from Villa himself safe conducts to leave by train for the border, the train in which they were was caught up at Montezuma by a locomotive in which were several officers in Villa's confidence, headed by an ex-Maderista deputy called Miguel Baca Ronquillo, who took them from the train and shot them in the presence of the passengers.

Broken Hydroplane at Sea.

A broken hydroplane was picked up at sea off the north coast of Scotland about a week ago by the trawler Lord Durham, when outward bound for the fishing off the Faroe islands. The portion is about 16 feet in length, but there are no identification marks. It has been deposited with the receiver of wrecks at Grimsby. There appears to be some mystery in connection with the matter. The admiralty have stations in Orkney and at Cromarty, but so far as is known publicly there has been no accident of a kind to leave a portion of a hydroplane floating in the water. It will be recollected that some time ago there was an accident at Cromarty to a pilot who had taken the first lord of the admiralty up for several flights there, but the machine was not left in the sea. The exact place where the part of the hydroplane was picked up is not given, and unless there has been an unreported naval mishap, it is impossible to account for the find. It may be recalled that at various times, as far north as Shetland and south to the Buchan coast, and especially in Orkney, rumors of strange aircraft heard at night were rife. The stories were never authenticated, and were generally disbelieved. In any case, they happened so long ago that the alleged airships of that time can hardly be connected with the Lord Durham's freight.

A Needless Question.

"Did you have any ancestors on the Mayflower?"

"What a foolish question to ask. You've never heard me boasting that I had, have you?"

LIGHTSHIP IS LOST; HAD CREW OF 25

WRECKAGE AND THREE BODIES DISCOVERED OFF NOVA SCOTIA COAST.

WAS ON ITS MAIDEN VOYAGE

Ship on Way to Halifax From Scotland, Where It Had Just Been Built—All Victims Are Scotchmen.

Halifax, N. S., May 25.—The loss of the new lightship Halifax No. 19, with all of the twenty-five men on board is indicated by the discovery of wreckage and three bodies near Liscomb, 100 miles east of here.

Just Been Built.

The lightship was on its way to this port from Paisley, Scotland, where it was built.

The lightship is believed to have struck a rock while feeling its way through the thick fog that has enshrouded the coast for several days.

The wreckage was sighted and the bodies picked up by the steamer Dufferin, which reported that life belts marked "Halifax No. 19" were strapped about each of the victims.

Search For Bodies.

Upon receipt of the news of the wreck, the government marine agency here made preparations to send out steamers in search of other bodies. All of the victims are believed to be Scotchmen, who were engaged by the builders at Paisley to navigate the vessel across the Atlantic.

The lightship sailed a few days ago from St. Johns, N. F., where she had stopped for coal.

Liscomb, the supposed scene of the disaster, is a small island off the eastern coast of Nova Scotia, and is about forty miles west of Cape Canso.

PANAMA LOCKS HELD SAFE

Canal Authorities Asserts Defective Beams Were Discovered and Thrown Out.

Washington, May 25.—The great steel locks in the Panama canal are as strong and as safe as engineering skill can make them, and there is not the slightest danger to life or property in their use, notwithstanding the disclosure of attempted fraud in the supply of proper metal for their construction.

This statement was made at the Isthmian Canal offices when attention was called to criminal presentments found by the grand jury in Pittsburgh against five steel makers on a charge of conspiracy to furnish inferior material for the locks.

Major Boggs, in charge of the canal offices here, explained that the attempt to deliver defective steel castings that had not been fully treated an annealed, had been discovered by the government inspectors before the material was worked into the locks.

Thousands See Man Drown.

Alton, Ill., May 25.—As thousand looked on powerless to aid, Robert Cowan, aged 18, fell 500 feet with a balloon into the Mississippi river opposite Alton, and was drowned.

Refugee Ship Bringing 450.

Vera Cruz, May 25.—Picking up 186 Americans who had arrived there from Mexico City the steamer Monterey has sailed for New Orleans from Puerto, Mexico, according to advices received by W. W. Canada, American consul here. The Monterey carries over 450 Americans in all. She will not touch Vera Cruz again to take on board a score or more other Americans gathered here, who are anxious to return to the United States. The Monterey is the last of the chartered refugee ships in Mexican waters.

HOME RULE NEAR PASSAGE

CIVIL WAR MAY COME, AS RESULT, IN IRELAND.

Ulster and Nationalist Factions are Armed for Instant Action.

London, May 25.—In the course of a few hours, the home rule bill will pass its third reading in the house of commons, barring accidents, and in due course become a law, despite the opposition of the house of lords whose veto under the parliament act is limited to two successive sessions.

There will be a long hard fight, however, possibly civil war in Ireland, before a parliament is set up in Dublin for the Ulster men are determined that the Protestant portion of the province shall be excluded from the operation of the bill, and threaten to establish a provisional government as soon as the bill leaves the house of commons.

It was thought that the Ipswich election, in which C. F. G. Masterman, lately appointed chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was defeated by the Unionist candidate, might influence the cabinet to take a different course, but this hope was dissipated by a letter from the Right Honorable Herbert Samuel, postmaster general, in which the minister, quoting the figures of 42 bye-elections since the bill was introduced in 1912, sets up the claim that 236,000 electors voted for the candidates who were pledged to home rule and 201,000 electors voted for the candidates opposed to home rule. He concludes his letter by saying.

"The eyes of England are now turning on Ulster, where arrangements have been made to assemble the provisional government and mobilize the well armed volunteers. Arms and ammunition have been distributed and plans have been completed for the calling out of the volunteers at a moment's notice. According to the orders to the commanders of the volunteers these steps have been taken 'to assist in keeping peace in the event of disturbances arising out of the passage of the home rule bill.

"Londonderry and Tyron are danger points, for here the Nationalists and Ulster men are evenly divided and both are armed. Nationalist rejoicings over the passage might easily lead to a clash and extra police have been drafted for service in these districts, and, if necessary, the military will be ordered to proceed to the assistance of the civil authorities in case of trouble."

Lake Huron Steamer Sinks.

Port Huron, Mich, May 25.—The steamer W. H. Gilbert, owned by the Pittsburg Steamship company, was sunk as the result of a collision with the steamer Caldera, about 15 miles below Thunder Bay island, in Lake Huron. The vessels came together in a heavy fog. Captain Cummings of the Gilbert succeeded in getting all of his crew on board the Caldera before the Gilbert went down. They were landed here. The Caldera was badly damaged about the bow.

Kermit Roosevelt at Madrid.

Madrid, May 23.—Kermit Roosevelt, whose marriage with Miss Belle Wyatt Willard, daughter of the American ambassador to Spain, is to take place early in June, has arrived here.

Odd Ruling at Vera Cruz.

Vera Cruz, May 25.—An odd situation in which the army finds itself was set forth in a general order issued by Judge Advocate John J. Porter, in charge of the civil affairs at Vera Cruz. The order states that under the instructions of the war department the military occupation of Vera Cruz does not warrant the forcible seizure of private property without consent even though compensation be made. The occupation of private premises against the wishes of the owner also is impossible.

BECKER IS GUILTY, SECOND JURY FINDS

FIVE BALLOTS NECESSARY TO CONVICT HIM OF FIRST DEGREE MURDER.

GRANTED STAY TILL MAY 29

Only Pardon or Interference Again by Court Can Save Former New York Police Lieutenant From Chair.

New York, May 25—Twelve men decided for the second time that Charles Becker was the arch-conspirator responsible for the Rosenthal murder which nearly two years ago awoke New York to a realization of corruption in the police department and opened a new era of police reform.

First Degree Murder.

Becker, once a police lieutenant, was found guilty of murder in the first degree. Only a pardon or interference again by the court of appeals can save him from following to the electric chair the four gunmen who shot Herman Rosenthal, the gambler, early on the morning of July 16, 1912.

The jury decided that the gunmen were Becker's agents.

Five Ballots Necessary.

Five ballots were necessary to decide Becker's fate. They were taken almost immediately after the jurors returned from luncheon at an uptown hotel, where they went as soon as Supreme Court Justice Samuel Seabury finished his charge. The fifth was unanimous for conviction.

Tears streamed down the foreman's face as he announced the decision and tears stood in the eyes of several other jurymen, but sympathy did not warp their judgment. They had agreed that the corroboration which the district attorney failed to present at the first trial to support the stories of Rose, Vallon and Webber, the three accomplices who turned informers, had been furnished by the new witnesses at the second.

Week's Stay Granted.

Becker's counsel announced that he would appeal and gained a week's stay for the preparation of his future campaign.

The defendant was granted a short meeting with his wife and his brothers and then taken back to his cell in the Tombs.

Becker and his wife were talking in a room adjoining the sheriff's office when a court attendant announced that the jury had reached a verdict.

Mrs. Becker was not permitted to accompany her husband to the courtroom.

"Foreman," Clerk Penny asked. "have you reached a verdict?"

Blagden, a youngish man, blond and slim, brushed his eyes with a handkerchief, already damp.

"We have," he said softly. "We find the defendant—" he hesitated a moment and continued in a whisper:

"We find this defendant guilty as charged in the indictment; guilty of murder in the first degree."

The veins at Becker's temples swelled. His great frame swayed and drooped; then, with quick control, he became himself again.

Manton, attorney for the convicted man, told by the court he would be granted a reasonable time in which to make any motion he deemed advisable, asked for one week and received it.

"Charles Becker, you are remanded to the Tombs prison until May 29," the court announced.

OPTIMISM IN MEXICO CITY

Confidently Expected There That Mediators Will Effect Amicable Settlement.

Mexico City, May 25.—Extreme optimism is manifested in official circles over the final outcome of the peace conference at Niagara Falls on the basis of the preliminary work done there. The foreign office in particular is greatly pleased and confidence is expressed there that the difficulty between the United States and Mexico would be satisfactorily arranged.

A high official said that President Huerta, actuated by the highest patriotic motives, was willing to sacrifice himself for the good of the country and a settlement of the difficulty was now believed to be less difficult than before the conferences began. President Huerta was said to be only concerned with a settlement compatible with the decorum and dignity of Mexico.

Passengers Landed Safely.

Washington, May 23.—The destroyer Cassin which went to the assistance of the steamer Atlantis after the latter had gone ashore off the Mexican coast Wednesday brought the 90 passengers from the steamer to Tampico.

New Haven Road Hearing.

Washington, May 25.—Three directors of the New York, New Haven and Hartford railroad have been served with notices to testify before the interstate commerce commission which is ready to resume its investigation into the affairs of the New Haven. Their names, as announced: Lewis Cass Ledyard, George F. Baker and Geo. McCulloch Miller, New Haven directors, and E. D. Robbins, former counsel of the road, it is stated, are ready to testify, also.

GANG PLANK BREAKS; 3 DROWN

THREE MISSING, TEN HURT IN NEW YORK PIER ACCIDENT.

Score Plunged Into Hudson—Man Goes Insane Failing to Rescue Friend's Little Girl.

Hoboken, N. J., May 25.—The steamer Frederick VIII was about to start on her voyage over sea when a gang plank between her main deck and the pier broke without warning to a score or more persons hurrying across. Men, women and children—visitors returning ashore, and several passengers— were precipitated into the Hudson river. A few others fell back onto the pier and were hurt.

The list of victims contains the names of three known drowned, three other persons missing, and at least ten suffering from injuries or submersion. Men with grappling hooks continue to search for those who may be lost.

The body of three-year-old Annette Feldschau was recovered.

Those in the hospital include a junkman, known as "Junk" Peterson, who went temporarily insane after failing to rescue the Feldschau girl, daughter of a friend. The child slipped from his grasp while in the water. He was dragged upon the pier, but seeing a floating box, mistook it for the child and threw himself overboard again. He is expected to die.

Mrs. Anna Edwardsen of Brooklyn, was drowned and her body recovered. Her daughter Mary, three years old, fell into the water with her and was swept off by the tide. Of those injured three were women, including a passenger on the steamship.

According to a statement by the agents of the Frederick VIII's owners, the Scandinavian-American line, the accident was caused by the overcrowding of the gang plank, which the agents said was of steel, re-enforced with wood, in perfect condition. The whistle had blown as a last warning to visitors to go ashore. As they departed, belated steerage passengers rushed aboard.

The sailing of the vessel, which had what was said to be the largest number of cabin passengers—500—that ever left for Scandinavian ports on one ship from this city, was delayed an hour until it could be learned that none of the passengers was missing.

ROOSEVELT WILL TOUR U. S.

Progressives Lay Plans to Wage Vigorous Campaign Throughout Nation.

Oyster Bay, N. Y., May 23.—What Colonel Roosevelt described as "Not exactly a literary discussion" was held at Sagamore Hill. It was perhaps the most important political conference in which he has participated since the close of the campaign of 1912. It brought together representatives of New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio, the three states in which Colonel Roosevelt probably will do his hardest fighting this fall.

At the meeting were George W. Perkins of New York, chairman of the executive committee of the Progressive party; Charles Brown, member of the national committee Clifford Pinchot, Progressive Candidate for United States senator from Pennsylvania, and E. A. Van Valkenberg of Philadelphia, one of the foremost figures in the affairs in that state.

It was decided definitely that the tentative plans for Colonel Roosevelt's campaign trip from the Atlantic to the Pacific should be adopted. This tour probably will take the former president into almost every state in the Union.

'UNCLE JOE' ANNOUNCES SELF

Will Seek to Defeat Democratic Congressman in Eighteenth Illinois District.

Danville, Ill., May 23.—Formal announcement was made by former Speaker Joseph G. Cannon of his candidacy for the congressional nomination in the Eighteenth district, at a meeting of the Republican congressional committee, held at his residence. After the conference he announced that he would at once begin a vigorous campaign in the hope of unseating Representative Frank T. O'Hair, the present Democratic incumbent.

Girls Smarter Than Boys.

San Francisco, May. 25.—Girls are smarter than boys. Standardized tests of the relative intellects of the sexes, age for age, favor the physically weaker sex. This is what Lewis M. Terman, associate professor of education at Stanford university, told the San Francisco teachers' institute. Professor Terman explained that the difference was one rather of temperament and emotion than mind. He also said work that is the most rapid is the most accurate.

Divorce Law Recommendations.

Chicago, May 25.—Members of the general assembly of the Presbyterian church after devoting several hours to the discussion of recommendations for new state laws for the relation of marriage and divorce referred the subject back to the committee on Christian life and work for further consideration. Before the assembly adjourns it is expected that a revised report strongly criticising the present laxity and suggesting desired legislative reforms will be adopted.

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in a road house near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city and identifies the body. A young woman who accompanied Wrandall to the inn and subsequently disappeared, is suspected. Mrs. Wrandall starts back for New York in an auto during a blinding snow storm. On the way she meets a young woman in the road who proves to be the woman who killed Wrandall. Feeling that the girl had done her a service in ridding her of the man who though she loved him deeply, had caused her great sorrow. Mrs. Wrandall determines to shield her and takes her to her own home. Mrs. Wrandall hears the story of Hetty Castleton's life, except that portion that relates to Wrandall. This and the story of the tragedy she forbids the girl ever to tell. She offers Hetty a home, friendship and security from peril on account of the tragedy. Mrs. Sara Wrandall and Hetty attend the funeral of Challis Wrandall at the home of his parents. Sara Wrandall and Hetty return to New York after an absence of a year in Europe. Leslie Wrandall, brother of Challis, makes himself useful to Sara and becomes greatly interested in Hetty. Sara sees in Leslie's infatuation possibility for revenge on the Wrandalls and reparation for the wrongs she suffered at the hands of Challis Wrandall by marrying his murderess into the family. Leslie, in company with his friend Brandon Booth, an artist, visits Sara at her country place. Leslie confesses to Sara that he is madly in love with Hetty. Sara arranges with Booth to paint a picture of Hetty. Booth has a haunting feeling that he has seen Hetty before. Looking through a portfolio of pictures by an unknown English artist he finds one of Hetty. He speaks to her about it. Hetty declares it must be a picture of Hetty Glynn, an English actress, who resembles her very much. Leslie Wrandall becomes impatient and jealous over the picture painting and declares he is going to propose to Hetty at the first opportunity.

CHAPTER X.—Continued.

He looked as though he expected nothing. He could only sit back and wonder why the deuce Sara meant by behaving like this.

They returned at seven. Dinner was unusually merry. Sara appeared to have recovered from her indisposition; there was color in her cheeks and life in her smile. He took it to be an omen of good fortune, and was immeasurably confident. The soft, cool breezes of the starlit night blew visions of impending happiness across his lively imagination; fanned his impatience with gentle ardor; filled him with suppressed sighs of contentment, and made him willing to forego the delight of conquest that he might live the longer in serene anticipation of its thrills.

Ten o'clock came. He arose and stretched himself in a sort of ecstasy. His heart was thumping loudly, his senses swam. Walking to the verandah rail he looked out across the moonlit sound, then down at the selected nook over against the garden wall—spot to be immortalized!—and actually shivered. In ten minutes' time, or even less, she would be down there in his arms! Exquisite meditations!

He turned to her with an engaging smile, in which she might have discerned a prophecy, and asked her to come with him for a stroll along the wall. And so he cast the die.

Hetty sent a swift, appealing look at Sara's purposely averted face. Leslie observed the act, but misinterpreted its meaning.

"Oh, it is quite warm," he said quickly. "You won't need a wrap," he added, and in spite of himself his voice trembled. Of course she wouldn't need a wrap!

"I have a few notes to write," said Sara, rising. She deliberately avoided the look in Hetty's eyes. "You will find me in the library."

She stood in the doorway and watched them descend to the terrace, a sphinx-like smile on her lips. Hetty seemed very tall and erect, as one going to meet a soldier's fate.

Then Sara entered the house and sat down to wait.

A long time after a door closed stealthily in a distant part of the house—the sun-parlor door, she knew by direction.

A few minutes later an upstairs door creaked on its hinges. Some one had come in from the mellow night, and some one had been left outside.

Many minutes passed. She sat there at her father's writing table and waited for the other to come in. At last quick, heavy footfalls sounded on the tiled floor outside and then came swiftly down the hall toward the small, remote room in which she sat. She looked up as he unceremoniously burst into the room.

He came across and stood over her, an expression of utter bewilderment in his eyes. There was a ghastly smile on his lips.

"D——n it all, Sara," he said shrilly, "she—she turned me down."

He seemed incapable of comprehension.

She was unmoved. Her eyes narrowed, but that was the only sign of emotion.

"I—I can't believe—" he began querulously. "Oh, what's the use? She won't have me. 'Gad! I'm trembling like a leaf. Where's Watson? Have him get me something to drink. Never mind! I'll get it from the sideboard. I'm—I'm d——d!"

He dropped heavily into a chair at the end of the table and looked at her with glazed eyes. As she stared back at him she had the curious feeling that he had shrunk perceptibly, that his clothes hung rather limply on him. His face seemed to have lost all of its smart symmetry; there was a looseness about the mouth and chin that had never been there before. The saucy, arrogant mustache sloped dejectedly.

"I fancy you must have gone about it very badly," she said, pursing her lips.

"Badly?" he gasped. "Why—why, good heavens, Sara, I actually pleaded with her," he went on, quite pathetically. "All but got down on my knees to her. D——n me, if I can understand myself doing it either. I must have lost my head completely. Begged like a love-sick schoolboy! And she kept on saying no—no—no! And I, like a blithering ass, kept on telling her I couldn't live without her, that I'd make her happy, that she didn't know what she was saying, and— But, good Lord, she kept on saying no! Nothing but no! Do—do you think she meant to say no? Could it have been hysteria? She said it so often, over and over again, that it might have been hysteria. I never thought of that. I—"

"No, Leslie, it wasn't hysteria, you may be sure of that," she said deliberately. "She meant it, old fellow."

He sagged deeper in the chair.

"I—I can't get it through my head," he muttered.

"As I said before, you did it badly," she said. "You took too much for granted. Isn't that true?"

"God knows I didn't expect her to refuse me," he exclaimed, glaring at her. "Would I have been such a fool as to ask her if I thought there was the remotest chance of being—" The very thought of the word caused it to stick in his throat. He swallowed hard.

"You really love her?" she demanded.

"Love her?" There was a sob in his voice. "I adore her, Sara. I can't live without her. And the worst of it is, I love her now more than I did before. Oh, it's appalling! It's horrible! What am I to do, Sara? What am I to do?"

"Be a man for a little while, that's all," she said coolly.

"Don't joke with me," he groaned.

"Go to bed, and when you see her in the morning tell her that you understand. Thank her for what she has done for you. Be—"

"Thank her?" he almost shouted.

"Yes; for destroying all that is detestable in you, Leslie—your self-conceit, your arrogance, your false notions concerning yourself—in a word, your egotism."

He blinked incredulously. "Do you know what you're saying?" he gasped.

She went on as if she hadn't heard him.

"Assure her that she is to feel no compunction for what she has done, that you are content to be her loyal, devoted friend to the end of your days."

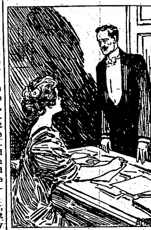
"But, hang it, Sara, I love her!"

"Don't let her suspect that you are humiliated. On the contrary, give her to understand that you are cleansed and glorified."

"What utter tommy—"

"Wait! Believe me, it is your only chance. You will have to learn some time that you can't ride roughshod among angels. Think it over, old fellow. You have had a good lesson. Profit by it."

"You mean I'm to sit down and twirl my thumbs and let some other chap snap her up under my very nose? Well, I guess not!"



"Damn It All, Sara! She—She Turned Me Down!"

"Not necessarily. If you take it manfully she may discover a new interest in you. Don't breathe a word of love to her. Go on as if nothing had happened. Don't forget that I told you in the beginning not to take no for an answer."

He drooped once more, biting his lip. "I don't see how I can ever tell mother that she refused—"

"Why tell her?" she inquired, rising.

His eyes brightened. "By Jove, I shan't," he exclaimed.

"I am going up to the poor child now," she went on. "I dare say you have frightened her almost to death. Naturally she is in great distress. I shall try to convince her that her decision does not alter her position in this house. I depend on you to do your part, Leslie. Make it easy for her to stay on with me."

He mellowed to the verge of tears.

"I can't keep on coming out here after this, as I've been doing, Sara."

"Don't be silly! Of course you can. This will blow over."

"Blow over?" he almost gasped.

"I mean the first effects. Try being a martyr for a while, Leslie. It isn't a bad plan, I can assure you. It may interest you to know that Challis proposed to me three times before I accepted him, and yet I—I loved him from the beginning."

"By Jove!" he exclaimed, coming to his feet with a new light in his eyes. The hollows in his cheeks seemed to fill out perceptibly.

"Good night!"

"I say, Sara, dear, you'll—you'll help me a bit, won't you? I mean you'll talk it over with her and—"

"My sympathy is entirely with Miss Castleton," she said from the doorway. His jaw dropped.

He was still ruminating over the callousness of the world in respect to lovers when she mounted the stairs and tapped firmly on Hetty's door.

* * * * * * * *

Hetty Castleton was standing in the middle of her room when Sara entered. From her position it was evident that she had stopped short in her nervous, excited pacing of the floor. She was very pale, but there was a dogged, set expression about her mouth.

"Come in, dear," she said, in a manner that showed she had been expecting the visit. "Have you seen him?"

Sara closed the door, and then stood with her back against it, regarding her agitated friend with serious, compassionate eyes.

"Yes. He is terribly upset. It was a blow to him, Hetty."

"I am sorry for him, Sara. He was so dreadfully in earnest. But, thank God, it is over!" She threw back her head and breathed deeply. "That horrible, horrible nightmare is ended. I suppose it had to be. But the mockery of it—think of it, Sara!—the damnable mockery of it!"

"Poor Leslie!" sighed the other. "Poor old Leslie."

Hetty's eyes filled with tears. "Oh, I am sorry for him. He didn't deserve it. God in heaven, if he really knew everything! If he knew why I could not listen to him, why I almost screamed when he held my hands in his and begged—actually begged me to— Oh, it was ghastly, Sara!"

She covered her face with her hands, and swayed as if about to fall. Sara came quickly to her side. Putting an arm about the quivering shoulders, she led the girl to the broad window seat and threw open the blinds.

"Don't speak of it, dearest—don't think of that. Sit here quietly in the air and pull yourself together. Let me talk to you. Let me tell you how deeply distressed I am, not only on your account, but his."

They were silent for a long time, the girl lying still and almost breathless against the other's shoulders. She was still wearing the delicate blue dinner gown, but in her fingers was the exquisite pearl necklace Sara had given her for Christmas. She had taken it off and had forgotten to drop it in her jewel box.

"I suppose he will go up to the city early," she said monotonously.

"Leslie is a better loser than you think, my dear," said Sara, looking out over the tops of the cedars. "He will not run away."

Hetty looked up in alarm. "You mean he will persist in—in his attentions," she cried.

"Oh, no. I don't believe you will find him to be the bugbear you imagine. He can take defeat like a man. He is devoted to you, he is devoted to me. Your decision no doubt wrecks his fondest hopes in life, but it doesn't make a weakling of him."

"I don't quite understand—"

"He is sustained by the belief that he has paid you the highest honor a man can pay to a woman. There is no reason why he should turn his back on you, as a sulky boy might do. No, my dear, I think you may count on him as your best, most loyal friend from this night on. He has just said to me that his greatest pain lies in the fear that you may not be willing to accept him as a simple, honest, unpresuming friend since—"

"Oh, Sara, if he will only be that and nothing more!" cried the girl wonderingly.

Sara smiled confidently. "I fancy you haven't much to fear in that direction, my dear. It isn't in Leslie Wrandall's make-up to court a second repulse. He is all pride. The blow it suffered tonight can't be repeated—at least, not by the same person."

"I am so sorry it had to be Leslie," murmured Hetty.

"Be nice to him, Hetty. He deserves that much of you, to say the least. I should miss him if he found it impossible to come here on account of—"

"I wouldn't have that happen for the world," cried the girl in distress. "He is your dearest friend. Send me away, Sara, if you must. Don't let anything stand in the way of your friendship for Leslie. You depend on him for so much, dear. I can't bear the thought of—"

"Hush, dearest! You are first in my love. Better for me to lose all the others and still have you."

The girl looked at her in wonder for a long time. "Oh, I know you mean it, Sara, but—but how can it be true?"

"Put yourself in my place," was all that Sara said in reply, and her companion had no means of translating the sentence.

She could only remain mute and wondering, her eyes fixed on that other mystery, the cameo face in the moon that hung high above the somber forest.

"Poor Leslie," murmured Sara, a long time afterward, a dreamy note in her voice. "I can't put him out of my thoughts. He will never get over it. I have never seen one so stricken and yet so brave. He would have been more than a husband to you, Hetty. It is in him to be a slave to the woman he loves. I know him well, poor boy."

Hetty was silent, brooding. Sara resumed her thoughtful observations.

"Why should you let what happened months ago stand in the way of—"

She got no farther than that. With an exclamation of horror, the girl sprang away from her and glowered at her with dilated eyes.

"My God, Sara!" she whispered hoarsely. "Are you mad?"

The other sighed. "I suppose you must think it of me," she said dismally. "We are made differently, you and I. If I cared for a man, nothing in all this world could stand between me and him."

Hetty was still staring. "You don't mean to say you would have me marry Challis Wrandall's brother?" she said, in a sort of stupefaction.

Sara shook her head. "I mean this: you would be justified in permitting Leslie to glorify that which his brother desecrated; your womanhood, my dear."

"My God, Sara!" again fell in a hoarse whisper from the girl's lips.

"I simply voice my point of view," explained Sara calmly. "As I said before, we look at things differently."

"I can't believe you mean what you said," cried Hetty. "Why—why, if I loved him with all my heart, soul and body I could not even think of— Oh, I shudder to think of it!"

"I love you," continued Sara, fixing her mysterious eyes on those of the girl, "and yet you took from me something more than a brother. I love you, knowing everything, and I am paying in full the debt he owes to you. Leslie, knowing nothing, is no less your debtor. All this is paradoxical, I know, my dear, but we must remember that while other people may be indebted to us, we also owe something to ourselves. We ought to take pay from ourselves. Please do not conclude that I am urging or even advising you to look with favor upon Leslie Wrandall's honorable, sincere proposal of marriage. I am merely trying to convince you that you are entitled to all that any man can give you in this world of ours—we women all are, for that matter."

"I was sure that you couldn't ask me to marry him. I couldn't believe—"

"Forget what I have said, dearest, if it grieves you," cried Sara warmly. She arose and drew the girl close to her. "Kiss me, Hetty." Their lips met. The girl's eyes were closed, but Sara's were wide open and gleaming. "It is because I love you," she said softly. but she did not complete the sentence that burned in her brain. To herself she repeated: "It is because I love you that I would scourge you with Wrandalls!"

"You are very good to me, Sara," sobbed Hetty.

"You will be nice to Leslie?"

"Yes, yes! If he will only let me be his friend."

"He asks no more than that. Now, you must go to bed."

Suddenly, without warning, she held the girl tightly in her arms. Her breathing was quick, as of one moved by some sharp sensation of terror. When Hetty, in no little wonder, opened her eyes Sara's face was turned away, and she was looking over her shoulder as if cause for alarm had come from behind.

"What is it?" cried Hetty anxiously.

She saw the look of dread in her companion's eyes, even as it began to fade.

"I don't know," muttered Sara. "Something, I can't tell what, came over me. I thought some one was stealing up behind me. How silly of me."

"Ah," said Hetty, with an odd smile, "I can understand how you felt."

"Hetty, will you take me in with you tonight?" whispered Sara nervously. "Let me sleep with you. I can't explain it, but I am afraid to be alone tonight." The girl's answer was a glad smile of acquiescence. "Come with me, then, to my bedroom while I change. I have the queerest feeling that some one is in my room. I don't want to be alone. Are you afraid?"

Hetty held back, her face blanching. "No, I am not afraid," she cried at once, and started toward the door.

"There is some on in this room," said Sara a few moments later, when they were in the big bedroom down the hall.

"I—I wonder," murmured Hetty.

And yet neither of them looked about in search for the intruder!

Far into the night Sara sat in the window of Hetty's dressing room, her chin sunk low in her hands, staring moodily into the now opaque night, her eyes somber and unblinking, her body as motionless as death itself. The cooling wind caressed her and whispered warnings into her unheeding ears, but she sat there unprotected against its chill, her nightdress damp with the mist that crept up with sinister stealth from the sea.

CHAPTER XI.

In the Shadow of the Mill.

The next day but one was overcast. On cloudy, bleak days Hetty Castleton always felt depressed.

Leslie was to return from the wilds on the following day. Early in the morning Booth had telephoned to inquire if she did not want to go for a long walk with him before luncheon. The portrait was finished, but he could not afford to miss the morning hour with her. He said as much to her in pressing his invitation.

"Tomorrow Leslie will be here and I sha'n't see as much of you as I'd like," he explained, rather wistfully. "Three is a crowd, you know. I've got so used to having you all to myself, it's hard to break off suddenly."

"I will be ready at eleven," she said, and was instantly surprised to find that her voice rang with new life, new interest. The grayness seemed to lift from the view that stretched beyond the window; she even looked for the sun in her eagerness.

It was then that she knew why the world had been bleaker than usual, even in its cloak of gray.

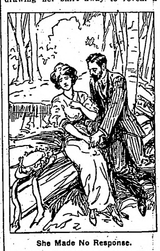
A little before eleven she set out briskly to intercept him at the gates. Unknown to her, Sara sat in her window, and viewed her departure with gloomy eyes. The world also was gray for her.

They came upon each other unexpectedly at a sharp turn in the avenue. Hetty colored with a sudden rush of confusion, and had all she could do to meet his eager, happy eyes as he stood over her and proclaimed his pleasure in jerky, awkward sentences. Then they walked on together, a strange shyness attending them. She experienced the faintness of breath that comes when the heart is filled with pleasant alarms. As for Booth, his blood sang. He thrilled with the joy of being near her, of the feel of her all about him, of the delicious feminine appeal that made her so wonderful to him. He wanted to crush her in his arms, to keep her there forever, to exert all of his brute physical strength so that she might never again be herself but a part of him.

They uttered commonplaces. The spell was on them. It would lift, but for the moment they were powerless to struggle against it. At length he saw the color fade from her cheeks; her eyes were able to meet his without the look in them that all men love. Then he seemed to get his feet on the ground again, and a strange, ineffably sweet sense of calm took possession of him.

"I must paint you all over again," he said, suddenly breaking in on one of her remarks. "Just as you are today—an outdoor girl, a glorious outdoor girl in—"

"In muddy boots," she laughed, drawing her skirt away to reveal a shapely foot in an American walking shoe.



She Made No Response.

He smiled and gave voice to a new thought. "By Jove, how much better looking our American shoes are than the kind they wear in London!"

"Sara insists on American shoes, so long as I am with her. I don't think our boots are so villainous, do you?"

"Just the same, I'm going to paint you again, boots and all. You—"

"Oh, how tired you will become of me!"

"Try me!"

"Besides, you are to do Sara at once. She has consented to sit to you. She will be wonderful, Mr. Booth, oh, how wonderful!"

There was no mistaking the sincerity of this rapt opinion.

"Stunning," was his brief comment.

She was silent for a long time, so long indeed that he turned to look at her.

"A thoroughly decent, fair minded chap is Leslie Wrandall," he pronounced, for want of something better to say. "Still, I'm bound to say, I'm sorry he is coming home tomorrow."

The red crept into her cheeks again.

"I thought you were such pals," she said nervously.

"I expect to be his best man if he ever marries," said he, whacking a stone at the roadside with his walking stick. Then he looked up at her furtively and added, with a quizzical smile: "Unless something happens."

"What could happen?"

"He might marry the girl I'm in love with, and, in that case, I'd have to be excused."

"Where shall we walk to this morning?" she asked abruptly. He had drawn closer to her in the roadway.

"Is it too far to the old stone mill? That's where I first saw you, if you remember."

"Yes, let us go there," she said, but her heart sank. She knew what was coming. Perhaps it were best to have it over with; to put it away with the things that were to always be her lost treasures. It would mean the end of their companionship, the end of a love dream. She would have to lie to him: to tell him she did not love him.

Coming to the jog in the broad macadam, they were striking off into the narrow road that led to the quaint old mill, long since abandoned in the forest glade beyond, when their attention was drawn to a motor car, which was slowing down for the turn into Sara's domain. A cloud of dust swam in the air far behind the machine.

A bare-headed man on the seat beside the driver waved his hand to them, and two women in the tonneau bowed gravely. Both Hetty and Booth flushed uncomfortably, and hesitated in their progress up the forest road.

The man was Leslie Wrandall. His mother and sister were in the back seat of the touring car.

"Why—why, it was Leslie," cried Booth, looking over his shoulder at the rapidly receding car. "Shall we turn back, Miss Castleton?"

"No," she cried instantly, with something like impatience in her voice. "And spoil our walk?" she added in the next breath, adding a nervous little laugh.

"It seems rather—" he began dubiously.

"Oh, let us have our day," she cried sharply, and led the way into the byroad.

They came, in the course of a quarter of an hour, to the bridge over the mill race. Beyond, in the mossy shades, stood a dilapidated, centurion structure known as Rangely's mill, a landmark with a history that included incidents of the Revolutionary war, when eager patriots held secret meetings inside its walls and plotted under the very noses of Tory adherents to the crown.

Pausing for a few minutes on the bridge, they leaned on the rail and looked down into the clear, mirror-like water of the race. Their own eyes looked up at them; they smiled into their own faces. And a fleecy white cloud passed over the glittering stream and swept through their faces, off to the bank, and was gone forever.

Suddenly he looked up from the water and fixed his eyes on her face. He had seen her clear blue eyes fill with tears as he gazed into them from the rail above.

"Oh, my dear!" he cried. "What is it?"

She put her handkerchief to her eyes as she quickly turned away. In another instant she was smiling up at him, a soft, pleading little smile that went straight to his heart.

"Shall we start back?" she asked, a quaver in her voice.

"No," he exclaimed. "I've got to go on with it now, Hetty. I didn't intend to, but—come, let us go up and sit on that familiar old log in the shade of the mill. You must, dear!"

She suffered him to lead her up the steep bank beyond and through the rocks and rotten timbers to the great beam that protruded from the shattered foundations of the mill. The rickety old wheel, weather-beaten and sad, rose above them and threatened to topple over if they so much as touched its flimsy supports.

He did not release her hand after drawing her up beside him.

"You must know that I love you," he said simply.

She made no response. Her hand lay limp in his. She was staring straight before her.

Perfectly Justifiable.

A somewhat laggard and procrastinating student one Sunday evening went to his instructor for aid in one of his studies, asking him if he thought it was wrong to study on Sunday. He was somewhat surprised to receive the reply, "If the Master was justified in pulling the ass out of the ditch on the Sabbath, was not the ass justifiable in trying to get himself out?"

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879

We see by the Thief River Falls papers that Lewis A. Nelson has announced himself as a candidate for sheriff and is publishing pictures of himself taken several years ago. Of course they resemble him some, only he now shows the affects of six or eight years dissipation. The Prohibition party should get a late picture of him and publish beside the old one to show the affects of intemperance.

Elwood L. Raab, candidate for the Republican nomination for governor, strikes the key note in the first plank of his platform when he says; "First" Greater care and economy in making appropriations so as to reduce taxation." A man that has the courage to come right out and stop the public tit suckers of the state in this fashion is certainly a safe man to trust. We have no time for the present governor and his board of state appointees that are sucking the last drop of blood out of the tax payers, and we have very little hope that Lee will be better. While some are inclined to smile at the candidacy of Raab, he might surprise them when the votes are counted. However a voter has a right to vote for first and second choice this year, and it might be well to vote one for Lee and one for Rabb. One as first and the other as second choice, but if you have any respect for yourself and family steer clear of Eberhart.

Bro. Hunt of the Sunbeam, attributes the loss of the normal school to the governor and Representative O,Neill. Why lay it to the governor, brother, he only had the appointing of two of the committee, and Mr. O'Neill claims he was directly responsible for the appointment of three of the members, and in most cases three should be a majority on a committee of five. —T. R. Falls New-Press.

Why not lay the blame where it belongs Bro. Cutter? Eberhart in his speech at Bemidji took unto himself a good deal of credit for the locating of the state normal school at that place. Taking his words to be true, he must have been O'Neill's assistant to steal it from Thief River Falls. When Eberhart's or O,Neill's supporters try to defend the action of these two gentlemen on this question they remind me of a boy, that we used to go to school with whose name was Johnnie Gibson. One day the teacher caught Johnnie in the act of committing a grave offence, and promptly gave him a vigorous shaking up. He then asked Johnnie if he was not sorry and ashamed to have done such a naughty thing. "Boo! Hoo! Boo! Hoo!' said, Johnnie "I aint ashamed or sorry I done it, but I am sorry I got caught at it." That is the way with Eberhart and O'Neill. Of course Eberhart will get the benefit of his trick at Bemidji, and we hope to see O'Neill get what is coming to him from Pennington and Red Lake counties, which is not a vote from any man who has intelligence enough to understand the situation.

The supporters of Lee for governor are making a strong campaign for his nomination at the June primary, and if they succeed in getting the common people stirred up enough so they will turn out and vote, Eberhart will be defeated. The present state machine have a string of feeders at the public crib and office appointees, and cheap hirelings that reaches from the dome of the Capitol building at St. Paul to the Eleven Towns at Eric, and you bet this gang will all be on hard to vote, and if the people who are opposed to gang rule and supporting this crowd stay at home on election day, Eberhart will be nominated, but you bet he will not be elected, for Hammond will put him to sleep in November.

AN ODE TO DAN

COMMUNICATED.

Dan Patrick was a man sir! just full er polyticks,
Fer he was full of changes as a sheep is full er ticks
One day he was er Populist, and yelled fer silver FREE,
The next he was a dimmekrat uv the wust variety;
Then he bacame Republican, because they had the pie,
And at their counter, gentlemen! he swears he'll live and die.
He shouts for county Option, because they have the votes
But begorra he is drinkin wid the other thirsty soaks.
The way he hates the Socialists, is away beyant belief,
And to blisther ivry soul av thim, gives Dan'l swate relief,
Ah! 'lection day is comin and Daniel's nadin votes,
So he seeks the Socialists quarters, as a lop eared mule seeks oats
He gives them ov his dollars, as a dog might give his bone
And makes the softest spaches, for he's licked the blarney stone.
Onr Danny boasts acquaintance with the Natobs of the land
"They'll rush to do him service, they'll eat out ov his hand
To locate Normal Schools Sorr, he'd just to lay the lines
And they'd tumble o'er each other from Eberhart to Rines"
But in laying lines, Dan Patrick forgot to take up slack,
For BEMIDJI got the NORMAL and Thief River HOLDS THE SACK.
Now we have lost our dollars and we've lost the Normal School,
Instead of playin' polyticks, we've simply played the fool.
And now swate Dan'l you'd better stay at home,
Just stick to taters and let polyticks alone,

THE LOCAL NEWS

Erie will celebrate July 4th.

Get your timothy, blue grass and clover seed at Ellingsons.

Ye editor was transacting business at Erie last Saturday.

Inquire at Ellingson Bros. for seed potatoes.

W. H. Wilde has been appointed assessor for the town of Mayfield.

We had another fine shower of rain last night which will rush the growth of grain and grass.

Ellingson has a lot of guaranteed timothy and clover seed which they are selling at reasonable prices.

The price of flax is going steadily upward and the prospects are that it will be a much better price this fall than it was last year.

Thief River Fall is furnishing all the candidates for office this year, but they have put up a fairly good bunch to choose from.

Buy your seed corn at Ellingson Bros. at Highlanding. They have the following varieties, yellow dent, Northwestern dent. golden dent, Red Minnesota dent.

Andrew Trovaton, G. Halverson, and some of the candidates for county office entertained a small audience at the Highlanding school house, last Sunday afternoon on political issues of the day.

John A. Duffy candidate for Representative, accompanied by Charles Fellman, of Red Lake Falls were up through this locality this week looking over the political fences of Mr. Duffy, and report them to be in fairly good repair.

Theodore Liden candidate for the nomination for County Treasurer has been making a personal canvas of this territory this weeek. Mr. Liden appears to be a young man well qualified for the position.

The farmers were so late finishing seeding that there will not be much ground broken and seeded to flax this year. Flax seeded as late as the 10th of June is quite sure to mature, but if sown later than that, there is a prospect that jack frost will catch it in the fall.

Sheriff Kelly of Polk County was up this way last Friday, and arrested Joseph LaCounte on suspicion of having been mixed up in a murder that was committed in Polk County fourteen years ago, Another man has been arrested also, and the Polk County officers are investigating the case.

The boom articles on Canada that are running in this paper are not true. It places an editor in a bad position to have to deny in one column of his paper, what is published in another column; but when you have to buy one side printed in Minneapolis, by a corporation that will run any kind of advertising for so much per line, we have to say that they are lying in their advertisement, and any Pennington county farmer who gets the Canada fever from reading these advertisements will get promptly cured if he goes up there.

We cannot understand why any resident of either Pennington or Red Lake counties can support O'Neill for another term in the legislature, when it is so apparent to any fair minded man that he beastly betrayed our interest by locating that Normal School to Bemidji instead of Thief River Falls. There is no evidence of course that he got any great amount of money for doing it, but the town site boomers of Minneapolis and Bemidji had plenty of money to spend to locate that school. Then talk about promoting the man that had that school in his vest pocket and handed it to Bemidji, to the upper house of the legislature.

Pay up your back subscription.

Politicians should run their automobiles under cover for a few days, until the farmers finish their flax sowing.

Lewis A. Nelson, candidate for sheriff was around interviewing farmers to-day, and made this office a pleasant call. He reports that his campaign is progressing finely and that he feels confident of receiving the nomination. The farmer candidate, Thoistad, also feels confident of being nominated which would leave poor "Jess" out in the cold.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENT

Inserted by G. P. Jones and paid for by him at regular advertising rates.

To the voters of Sixty Fifth Dist, composed of the Counties of Pennington, Clearwater and Red Lake. Having recently filed as a candidate for Representative for this district, I herewith announce my Candidacy through the public press.

In soliciting your support and votes at the coming Primary Election to be held June 16th, 1914. I deem, it incumbent upon me, under the present non-parisan Primary, to submit a platform for your consideration covering the most important issues now before the people of this state and district.

If nominated and elected I pledge to use my best efforts and ability, to work for the following legislation.

Legislation for economy and efficiency in the state Administration of business affairs, for the purpose of lightening the burden of the present high taxes.

Legislation for increasing the efficiency of our present Road Law, known as the "Dunn Good Road Law."

Legislation that will prevent discrimination in the enforcement of our tax levies.

Also I will favor legislation giving both sexes an equal franchise.

I shall encourage the adoption of the Revolving Fund Amendment, known as House File No. 1212. Also the Initative Referendum Amendment.

Realizing that the people in the Sixty Fifth Dist. are dependent upon the Agricultural products of the soil, and her wealth must come there from, I shall favor all legislation that will tend to benefit rural communities especially the farmers and laborers.

I am opposed to "Boss" rule, Boss rulers, are political "Yeggmen," robbing the voters our of their inherent rights of a free ballot debarring them rom a free choice of their Legislators; —therefore, I favor our present Non-Partisan Primary Law and will support all legislation that will tend to make our primary law more efficient. I am opposed to the centralization of the power of Government but firmly believe in the rule of the people in governing all their local and domestic affairs.

If nominated and elected I shall support every measure that will tend to increase the power of the people in local and state government and all measures that will tend to build up the social conditions of our rural communities.

Signed. G. P. JONES,

CANADA'S PLACE AS A PRODUCER

Canada Is Getting a Great Many Americans.

"Three young provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta," says a New York financial journal, "have already made Winnipeg one of the greatest primary wheat markets of the world. In 1904 they raised 58,000,000 bushels of wheat. Five years later they produced 150,000,000 bushels. In 1913 the crop approximated 200,000,000 bushels. At the present rate of progress Canada must soon pass France and India, and stand third in the line of wheat producers. Ultimately it will dispute with Russia and the United States for the first position. Wheat has been the pioneer of our development. Undoubtedly it will prove the same with Canada. In the last calendar year our trade with Canada amounted to 497 million dollars. Only with two countries—the United Kingdom and Germany—is our trade greater. No vivid imagination is needed to see what the future development of Canada means to the people of the United States.

The influx of American settlers to the Canadian prairies is now in full swing. Within the past few days over 80 of those arrived at Bassano carrying with them effects and capital to the value of $100,000. Fifty settlers from Oregon arrived in Alberta a few days ago; while 15 families of settlers from the state of Colorado arrived at Calgary on their journey northwards. The goods and personal effects of this party filled 20 box cars. Of live stock alone they had 175 horses, 15 cows and 2,000 head of poultry. Another class of settler has arrived at Peers, 110 miles west of Edmonton, where no fewer than 200 German farmers have taken up land. These are from good farming families and brought with them a large amount of capital.

Then in South Western Saskatchewan, there are large numbers settling, these from the United States predominating, while in the northern and central portions of all these provinces, the settlement of new people is going on steadily. Early in April, Peter Goertz arrived in Cardiff after a six-day journey from McPherson, Kansas. Mr. Goertz who had purchased land here was in charge of a party of 38 people from the same part of Kansas and they came through with a special train which included all their stock and implements. The equipment was all Rock Island cars, and was the first full immigrant train ever sent out by that railroad. The farms purchased by the members of the party are amongst the best in the district.

When the Panama exposition opens next year any of the three transcontinental lines in Canada will make convenient means of transport for those going to visit, and in doing so agricultural districts of Western Canada can be seen, and ocular demonstration given those who have heard but not before seen, of that which has attracted so many hundreds of thousands of American settlers.—Advertisement.

A young society woman was having a chat one evening with a young man whom she had just met. They were in the conservatory.

"Well, really, replied the young fellow, slowly, "the light is so dim here I can't say just now."—Monthly Magazine.

FAILURE in BUSINESS GENIUS in WAR

GENERAL ULYSSES S. GRANT

RARE PHOTOGRAPH MADE WHILE GRANT WAS PRESIDENT SO THAT A MEDAL MIGHT BE DESIGNED FROM IT

WHEREVER a group of grizzled Union veterans are gathered on Memorial day to crown with flags and flowers the graves of their comrades gone before, the figures of the two great Americans inevitably present themselves in imagination. One is Lincoln, the other is Grant. With the exception of Napoleon and Shakespeare, few characters in history have been so exhaustively written about as the great emancipator, but in the American Walhalla a niche near to his proclaims the fame of the warrior to whom Lee surrendered.

Rarely does it happen that a man who earns recognition as a total failure in life afterward achieves exalted success. This was exactly what happened, however, to Ulysses S. Grant, who not only struggled through many years of grinding and almost hopeless poverty, but actually fell into such disesteem on account of his inability to "make good" at anything, that people generally were disposed to look upon him as an undesirable person to employ.

There are people still living in St. Louis who remember Grant as a shabby little man who brought loads of cordwood into town and sold it from door to door. He had been a captain in the army, but had resigned, and at the period in question he lived on a farm some distance out of St. Louis, on the Gravois road.

But, in order to make it clear how this state of affairs came about, one must go back a few steps—in fact, to the boyhood of Grant, who was born at Point Pleasant, Ohio, April 27, 1822. His name was Ulysses Hiram. His mothed used jokingly to say to him: "Be sure you don't become useless!" Not much is known about his early youth, except that at eight years of age he could ride horseback standing on one foot. He had remarkable skill with horses, and a story is told of his volunteering to bestraddle, at a circus, an unmanageable pony which nobody else dared tackle. At the bidding of the ringmaster a large monkey jumped up behind him on the horse, and thence upon his shoulders, holding on to his hair, but he hung on like grim death, unperturbed.

Another anecdote has to do with a horse which his father sent him to buy. "How much did your father tell you to pay for it?" asked the owner of the animal. "He told me," replied the boy, "to offer you $50, and if you would not take that to make it $55 or even $60, if necessary."

Naturally, the man said that the price of the horse was $60 Whereupon the lad added: "But I have made up my mind not to pay you more than $50, and you can take that or nothing."

He got the horse for $50.

It so happened that General Hamer, the member of congress from that district, was a friend of Grant's father, and he took the trouble to obtain for Ulysses an appointment at West Point. In sending in the requisite papers, he mixed up the name of Ulysses with that of his brother Simpson, so that young Grant found himself put down on the roster of cadets as U. S. Grant. This accident earned for him at the Point the nickname of "Uncle Sam"—afterward abbreviated to "Sam," by which title of intimacy he was known for many years after he left the military academy.

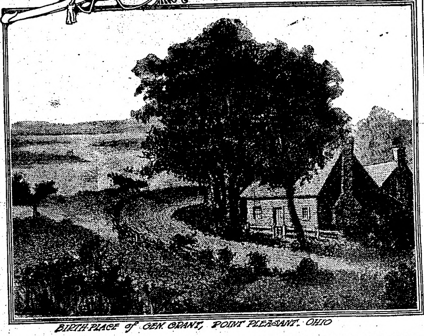
He is described at this period of his career as an undersized, awkward youth, much freckled, with high spirits, and very careless about his dress. Many of his fellow-cadets, who prided themselves upon birth and breeding, manifested an inclination to look down upon him, because he was only a tanner's son. While at the Point he distinguished himself chiefly by his horsemanship, and one leap that he made on horseback is said to remain to this day an unequaled record at the academy.

Scarce was young Grant graduated from West Point when he fell in love with a girl named Dent, the daughter of a man who owned considerable farming property on the Gravois road, not far from St. Louis. Her father did not approve of the match, but her mother favored it, and the upshot of it was that they became engaged. Then the Mexican war broke out, in which Grant fought with credit, and at the termination of the conflict he went back to St. Louis and married the young lady.

Six years later, in 1854, he resigned from the army, and with this separation from the military service began a long struggle against poverty. He was unable to hold on to any sort of employment, and finally, to help him out, his father-in-law offered to give him 40 acres of the Dent farm, on the condition that he would clear the timber off of it. This task he undertook, incidentally building a log house of four rooms, in which he lived with his wife and children.

It was at this time that he made a meager living by hauling wood to town and selling it on the streets. Usually he was dressed in a worn-out private soldier's uniform. But it is a matter of record that he never lost his cheerfulness, though everything he tried seemed foredoomed to failure. He was defeated in his candidacy for the place of surveyor of St. Louis county, and his later application for appointment as county engineer was turned down with the simple indorsement, "Rejected."

At length he decided to abandon his little farm, which he had called by the appropriate name of Hardscrabble, and moved with his family to St. Louis. There he tried the real estate business, but, as usual, failed at it. As commonly happens when a man is persistently unsuccessful, friends grew chilly. At this juncture, when things seemed about as hopeless as they could be, Grant's father offered him a job of clerk in his leather and saddlery store at Galena, the wages to be $50 a month. He was glad to accept it.



BIRTH-PLACE of GEN. GRANT, POINT PLEASANT, OHIO

The year 1860 found Grant keeping the books in the saddlery store. Everybody looked upon him as a failure in life, and it is likely that he himself shared this opinion. But soon afterward, when the war broke out, he was led to hope that it might offer him some opportunity. His first effort in this direction was to urge a relative to furnish the small amount of money necessary for starting a business of selling bread to the military camp near St. Louis. Meeting with a refusal he went to Springfield, Ill., and asked Governor Yates to give him employment in some capacity, it mattered not what. The governor did not look upon his application with much favor, but finally directed that he be hired at $3 a day to do odd jobs at Camp Yates.

Little as he could have imagined it, however, a new day was about to dawn upon the fortunes of Captain Grant, as he was then called. There was in camp at Mattoon a very unruly regiment of volunteers, the Twenty-first Illinois infantry, which seemed likely to be disbanded because of its unwillingness to submit to discipline. Grant, after all, was a West Pointer, and any real knowledge of military matters was just then at a high premium. He was asked if he cared to undertake the job of commanding the regiment in question, and promptly accepted the offer, becoming its colonel.

It did not take him long to get the regiment into shape. Anybody who attempted to dispute his authority was soon sorry for it. In July he had orders to transfer his command to Alton. The regiment refused to ride on the freight cars provided for its transportation, and he made the men march all the way. He would not even allow them to get aboard a freight train when one came along.

Modesty was always a marked trait of this military commander. When, some time before the events just narrated, a friend urged him to apply for the colonelcy of a regiment, he said: "Few men are able to command 1,000 soldiers, and I am sure I am not one of those." And yet the day was to arrive before very long when he would command a million men. When asked, three years later, "What sort of a man is Grant?" Abraham Lincoln replied: "He is the quietest little fellow you ever saw. He makes the least fuss of any man you ever knew. I believe two or three times he has been in this room quite a while before I knew he was here. It's about so all around. The only evidence you have that he's in any place is that he makes things git! Wherever he is he makes things move."

In later years, particularly after he became president, Grant was careful about his attire, but during the Civil war he preserved that indifference to costume which had marked him while at West Point. In the Vicksburg campaign he wore, in place of the usual military hat and gold cord, an old battered "stovepipe," such as the average private soldier in his army would not have picked up in the street. In his mouth was always a black cigar, and he seemed to be perpetually smoking. A friend of his, in excuse, said: "Such a stovepipe as Grant's should be allowed to smoke."

J. R. Ringwalt, author of the "Anecdotes of General Grant," says that he was never wounded, though he constantly and even recklessly exposed himself. He was not merely brave, but insensible to danger. Of his war horse, Cincinnatus, he was devotedly fond. On one occasion, while riding through a piece of woods in Virginia during a brisk engagement, he and Colonel Dent were obliged to cross a brook at a place where the fire of the enemy was concentrated and murderous. A piece of telegraph wire had got twisted around the off hind foot of Cincinnatus, and Grant dismounted and untwisted it, examining the leg in a leisurely and deliberate manner, notwithstanding the protests of his companion. Then, having mounted again, he said: "Dent, when you have got a horse you think a good deal of, you should never take any chances with him. If that wire had been left there a little longer, the animal would have gone dead lame, and he might perhaps have been ruined for life."

To which Dent replied: "I am your brother-in-law, and want no favors on that account, but I shall insist upon looking after your personal safety, and if you are hurt I will try to do better by you than you did by me in Mexico."

This was an allusion to a happening during the Mexican war, when Dent, having been wounded, was picked up by Grant and laid for safety upon a flat-topped wall, the idea being that Grant should come back for him later. Unfortunately, Dent rolled off the wall and broke two or three ribs, being much worse hurt thereby than by the shot that had hit him.

During the siege of Richmond, it is related, Grant was making an inspection of the docks at City Point, and stopped to look at a couple of negroes who were trying to roll a barrel of bacon aboard a boat. They were unable to move it, and a young lieutenant, standing by, said:

"Push harder, you niggers, or go get another man to help you."

The commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States thereupon rolled up his sleeves and helped roll the barrel aboard the boat, wiped his hands on his handkerchief, and walked away. It was not until later that the lieutenant, to his great mortification, learned who the man was.

Abraham Lincoln once remarked: "Grant is the first general I've had. I'll tell you what I mean. You know how it's been with all the rest. As soon as I put a man in command of the army he'd come to me with the plan of a campaign, and about as much as say, 'I don't believe I can do it, but if you say so I'll try it on'—and so put the responsibility of failure or success upon me. They all wanted me to be the general. Now, it isn't so with Grant. He hasn't told me what his plans are. I don't know, and I don't want to know. I am glad to find a man who can go ahead without me."

A senator's son in one of the departments in Washington drank hard and was discharged. His friends gave him up as hopeless, and he came pretty near to the gutter. Then he reformed, and struggled hard for years to support his family. President Grant heard about the case, and sent for him. He said: "I want to help you. What can I do for you?"

"I want work," replied the young man.

"You shall have it. Where would you prefer to go—in new scenes or old?"

"Send me, sir, where I left a blackened record. I could be useful in my former position."

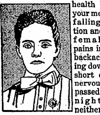
Grant gave him a note to the secretary of the department, asking that the young man be reinstated. But soon he came back, saying: "The secretary sent out word that my application would go on file." Whereupon the president, with some show of anger, remarked: "You can't put your wife and children on file, can you?" and gave him another note, saying: "Present this in person, and bring me an answer." The answer, duly returned, was "No vacancies." Grant wrote in red ink across the face of the note: "Make a vacancy, or I will." But, strange to say, even this did not accomplish any result.

No further notes were exchanged, but on the next day, after the cabinet meeting, the president tapped the secretary on the shoulder, and said to him: "Whom would you recommend as your successor?"

The secretary, having no alternative, wrote his resignation. As for the young man, it is related that he "made good," and rose to a position of honor and dignity in the world.

REMARKABLE CASE of Mrs. HAM

Declares Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Saved Her Life and Sanity.



Shamrock, Mo.—"I feel it my duty to tell the public the condition of my health before using your medicine. I had falling, inflammation and congestion, female weakness, pains in both sides, backaches and bearing down pains, was short of memory, nervous, impatient, passed sleepless nights, and had neither strength nor energy. There was always a fear and dread in my mind, I had cold, nervous, weak spells, hot flashes over my body. I had a place in my right side that was so sore that I could hardly bear the weight of my clothes. I tried medicines and doctors, but they did me little good, and I never expected to get out again. I got Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Blood Purifier, and I certainly would have been in grave or in an asylum if your medicines had not saved me. But now I can work all day, sleep well at night, eat anything I want, have no hot flashes or weak, nervous spells. All pains, aches, fears and dreads are gone, my house, children and husband are no longer neglected, as I am almost entirely free of the bad symptoms I had before taking your remedies, and all is pleasure and happiness in my home."—Mrs. JOSIE HAM, R. Gave Hecklers a Chance.

At one time the Republicans of Chicago were out and were fighting Democracy on industrial conditions and the putative helplessness of a situation which did not let the Republicans in. A parade was started off and was well on its way—nearly to the file closers—when a ward boss saw that two lighted transparencies lacked carriers. He looked around hurriedly and noticed that one of his retainers was idle. "Here," he yelled, "shoulder this and get in line." The shanghaied recruit was a gambler who busied himself in ward politics on occasions, but for the most stuck to his trade when trade was possible. As he hoisted the lighted legend, "Open up the mills and factories," there was a chorus of derisive yells from the sidewalk: "Never mind the mills. Open up the poker games."

DEMAND IS FOR ABLE MAN

High Positions Waiting for Those Who Are Competent Properly to Fill Them.

We know a big firm in one of the oldest and most important industries in this country which has been hunting for over a year for a man to whom to pay $15,000, and they cannot find him, writes the editor of the American Machinist.

We know an executive who wants two or three men as assistants; if he could find them in his plant he would gladly pay them $40 a week. He has tried a considerable number in these positions during the past year, but without success as yet. He feels that he is positively hampered by the lack of them.

We know that there is an active demand for $2,000- men, and we can readily believe that there is a keen demand for $10,000 men.

It is remarkable that in a plant employing, say a thousand men, there are so few who raise themselves above their fellows far enough to be conspicuous to the management. And even, of those few, not all have the initiative, the ginger, and faculty of being thorough that would make them of value as assistants to the executive. What a god-send to the engineer is the draughtsman who can do his own thinking, and dig out the solution of a problem somehow without constant prodding and pointing from the boss!

Masher Not Entirely Out of It, if He Would Accept the Situation as It Was.

He was one of those insufferable young pests who patronize restaurants trying to flirt with stenographers and telephone girls who drop in about noon for lunch. Approaching a young woman who was sitting alone, he lifted his hat and said suavely:

"I beg your pardon, miss."

"Well?" interrogated the girl calmly.

"Why, er—you see, it is this way. I made an engagement with a young lady whom I have never seen to meet me here. Now, are you waiting for me?"

The girl smiled queerly.

"I might be waiting for you," she said:

"Ah! Indeed," responded the masher, delightedly.

"Yes. You see, I ordered lobster and it hasn't come yet."

ERUPTION SPREAD ON FACE

810 East Elm St., Streator, Ill.—"A running sore broke out above my right eye, which spread over my entire face. It started as a small pimple. I scratched it open and the contents of this small pimple ran down my face. Wherever this ran a new sore appeared. They itched and burned terribly; I couldn't touch my face it burned so. It disfigured my face terribly and I couldn't be seen for everyone was afraid of it. It looked like a disease of some kind; it was all red and a heavy white crust on it. Everybody kept out of my way, afraid it would spread. I lost rest at night and I couldn't bear to have anything touch my face, not even the pillow. I had to lie on the back of the head. I was always glad when morning came so I could get up. It was extremely painful.

SHOOTS 4 WOMEN; THREE ARE DEAD

CRAZED MINNESOTA HUSBAND COMMITS SUICIDE AFTER RASH DEED.

JEALOUSY IS THE CAUSE

Mother-in-Law Wounded in Affair Not Expected to Live—No Witnesses of Tragedy on Farm Near Thief River Falls.

Thief River Falls.—At the home of O. K. Olson, living about thirty miles northeast of this city, occurred a triple and perhaps a quadruple murder and suicide. Louis Gilsoul was the murderer and suicide, and his victims were, Mrs. Ludwig Larson, Mrs. Gilsoul, Helen Olson, and Inga Olson, a younger sister of Helen.

Woman Threatened Him.

The murderer appeared at the home of Olson and was met at the door by Mrs. Larson, who refused him admittance and threatened him with a pair of ice tongs.

The man immediately drew a .32-caliber revolver from his pocket and shot the woman through the breast, and as she ran into the yard he followed and again fired, the second bullet penetrating her head and killing her instantly.

The man then entered the house and shot to death his estranged wife, formerly Helen Olson, and Inga Olson, a younger sister. He then turned the gun on Mrs. O. K. Olson, mother of the two girls, and fired five shots into her body. The elderly lady is still alive, but mortally hurt, it is thought. During the fusillade the murderer was attacked by the family dog and he also ended the life of the canine with the deadly weapon.

Due to Family Quarrel.

The cause of the tragedy is said to be attributable to family quarrels. About two years ago Gilsoul's first wife was adjudged insane and was committed to an asylum; soon after this he began paying marked attention to Helen Olson, and induced her to accompany him to his claim in Saskatchewan, Canada. Last February he married the girl. The report is that he mistreated her, and she wrote her cousin, Mrs. Ludwig Larson, requesting her to come for her, as she could endure the hardship no longer.

About two weeks ago Ludwig Larson and his wife went to Canada and in the absence of Gilsoul induced the girl to accompany them home, the Larsons, living with the Olsen family. Gilsoul returned, found his wife gone, and immediately followed and appeared at the house having walked out from this city it is thought.

Young Olson Appears.

There were no witnesses to the tragedy with the exception of a brother of the Olson girls, about 22, who drove into the yard just as Mrs. Larson was shot, the elder Olson having fled at the first sign of trouble. The boy immediately turned the horses and went to arm himself and notify the neighbors.

He returned shortly armed with a 30.40 rifle and while half a mile from the house met the murderer, who at sight of him, turned and ran into the brush. The son fired on the fleeing man and missed. Very soon after the assassin disappeared a shot was heard. But it was some two hours later before the brushes were entered by the posse and the dead body discovered.

The man had placed the muzzle to his head, and fired and across his breast was lying a marriage certificate on which was written: "This is to show that she was my wife." In his pocket was also found a note to his son by his first marriage in which he admonished the boy not to follow in his footsteps.

Gilsoul is reported that to have killed a negro in Beltrami county a number of years ago.

500 Out for Legislature.

St. Paul.—More than 500 candidates for the legislature have filed in the sixty-seven Minnesota districts created by the new apportionment. The reapportionment and the non-partizan primary law wiping out party lines in the legislature brought out an unprecedented number of candidates. Two candidates for each legislative place will be nominated June 16.

MURDERED FOR HIS MONEY

Jury Finds That Aged Brainerd Shoemaker Was Struck From Behind—Two Suspects.

Brainerd.—That George Rappel, the aged shoemaker, who was found dead in his tiny shop in the heart of the business district of Brainerd, was struck on the back of his head by a blunt instrument like a hammer, which fractured his skull, was the testimony of Dr. J. A. Thabes, who with Drs. Berg and Beise performed the autopsy.

The witnesses examined included Dan Doran, who called for his shoes and found the shoemaker lying on the floor of his shop; John Wise, from whom he had bought a glass of beer two hours before the tragedy and who saw the buckskin bag in which Rappel carried his money; George Rappel, Jr., his son, who testified the old man always carried money in the buckskin bag and a flat pocketbook, and R. E. Clark, the deputy coroner, who brought the body to the morgue.

The man's pockets were turned inside out, showing that robbery must have been the motive. The coroner's jury returned a verdict that Rappel "came to his death by receiving a blow on the head by the hands of persons unknown to this jury." Two suspects are in jail.

Rappel, who was [illegible]0 years old, was harmless and inoffensive, tended to his own business, worked a little garden plot near his shoe shop, saved his money and found no greater pleasure than playing with his little grandchildren and often minding the babies of his son.

COW BREAKS STATE RECORD

Enters Class of the 25 Best Butter Producers in the United States, Also.

Minneapolis.—With 22,063.5 pounds of milk and 991.5 pounds of butter to her credit in 365 days, Lady Oak Fobes DeKol, an agricultural college cow, has established a new record for Minnesota and broken into the class of the 25 highest butter producers in America. Her year's production of butter fat was 793.2 pounds. This is far in excess of the year's record of Pieteje Maid Ormsby, owned by John B. Irwin of Minneapolis. Mr. Irwin's cow won the world's championship in 1911 for butter production in a thirty-day period with a record of 145.66 pounds. This year's record of the animal, however, was only about 750 pounds of butter. This comparatively low year's record was attributed to the fact that the animal was taken from one place to another and kept on exhibition most of the time.

Members of the dairy department of the agricultural college have figured out that the milk produced by Lady Oak in one year is equivalent in food nutriment to that contained in five 1,200-pounds steers, or to twenty-five 500-pound steers.

Icemen Return to Work.

Minneapolis.—The local ice strike has been peacefully settled and 190 wagons which had been idle for nine days are making regular deliveries. After a long series of conferences a basis of agreement was reached which was satisfactory both to the union men and the company. The strikers obtained an advance of $2.50 a month in wages, with a commission which they estimate will yield in most cases at least $2.50 more. In addition, an arbitration plan was framed which is intended to make a similar strike practically impossible.

Red Wing Strike Is Settled.

Red Wing.—The strike of the employees of the Red Wing Shoe company is over. The employees will accept the schedule of working hours from 7:30 a. m. to 5:30 p. m., with half a day off on Saturdays. They have the assurance of officials that the ten-hour schedule will be put in force on July 1 and it is also probable their request that the week's work be made up of ten hours a day for five days with Saturday afternoons off, will be granted.

FOREST FIRES IN THREE STATES

RAGING IN MINNESOTA, WISCONSIN AND MICHIGAN.

Much Damage Is Caused by Conflagrations—Small Villages in Michigan are Destroyed.

Duluth. — Great brush and grass fires which have been burning for some time, have done considerable damage south and west of this city, according to reports, having destroyed large quantities of railroad timber, interrupted telegraphic communication, and in some cases halted trains.

Carlton, Minn., is the center of the worst part of the conflagration south of this city. Telephone and telegraph poles were burned at this city, halting communication between Duluth and the Twin Cities. Northern Pacific trains were stalled about three miles from Carlton when a huge pile of railroad ties on the right-of-way caught fire, blocking the tracks.

At Black Hoof, Minn., farmers have been fighting brush fires and have barely succeeded in keeping them in check. With a strong wind the flames will get beyond control in a short time and calls have been sent to larger towns nearby asking them to be prepared to give aid.

At Iverson, Minn., a large quantity of railroad ties and posts over 1,000 in all, were destroyed by a forest and brush fire.

North and west of Duluth fires are doing considerable damage. Towns along the eastern end of the Mesaba range all report large grass and brush fires.

It was while responding to a call from Hermantown, a few miles west of this city where a brush fire was doing considerable damage, that Assistant Chief Grantow of Duluth; struck and killed Lyda Hubert, the six-year-old daughter of Leander Hubert.

Fire that started in the dry house of the Section 30 mine at the village of Section 30 near Ely, destroyed the mine buildings and set fire to a heavy pine woods near by. This fire soon spread until it was beyond control.

A bridge was burned on the South Shore road near Nebagamon, Wis., and the South Shore trains are using the Northern Pacific tracks to get around the burned structure.

A passenger from Ashland, says that he heard when leaving there that logs estimated at 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 feet were burning near Saxon. They are the property of the Stearns Lumber company. He says there are many small fires along the Northern Pacific over toward Ashland.

Fires Well Under Control.

Duluth, May 21.—A light rain with prospects of heavier precipitation is expected to prevent any considerable amount of damage by grass and brush fires that have been burning south of here in the vicinity of Carlton, Minn., and northwest along the eastern end of the Mesaba range since early Sunday. Reports from Carlton, Iverson, Blackhoof and other small towns in that section, stated that while the fires were still burning they were well under control.

Stillwater Convict Convicted.

Stillwater.—Andrew Montpetit, a Mexican inmate of the new state prison, was tried by a jury in district court and found guilty of attempting to escape. He was given an indeterminate sentence by Judge P. H. Stolberg. It will begin when his present term expires. On Nov. 21 last Montpetit struck a guard at the new prison and jumped into an open box car as a train was leaving the prison yard. It was Montpetit's escape that caused the alleged controversy between Warden Wolfer and Deputy R. M. Cales that led to the latter's resignation.

Farmer and Helper Drown.

Stillwater.—Frank Imholt, 45 years old, and Mack Muller, 19 years old were drowned in the St. Croix river near the Imholt farm in Wisconsin two miles from here. The men were recovered by the tug Edwin C. They were brought to a morgue here, where the coroner from Hudson county held an inquest. The tragedy was discovered by the crew of the Edwin C., who saw the men's clothing on the bank.

Rochester Drafts Boys.

Rochester.—Mayor W. B. Richardson appointed thirty-one youths of the city as official inspectors in a sweeping cleanup campaign that was conducted last week. It was the duty of the boys to make an investigation of the entire city and report to the city clerk any premises that had not been cleaned up. The action was taken at the request of the Civic league. Saturday was inspection day, when the boys made the tour of the entire city.

Fire Along Tamarack River.

Duluth, May 22.—Forest fires that broke out along the Tamarack river 10 miles north of Ely, Minn., threaten to sweep the Crane Lake lumber camp out of existence. Rangers from Robinson Lake and Ely were summoned to fight the flames and assistance was called from the numbers of men who have been battling the other brush fires in the vicinity now well under control due to the rains of the last 24 hours. The Tamarack river blaze, it is thought, was started from brush fires.

Sizing Up Louis.

There recently came to a fashionable shoe shop in Chicago a daughter of a man whose wealth has been acquired within very recent years. The young woman was disposed to patronize the clerk, and rejected a number of "classy" slippers he produced for her approval. Finally she said.

"I think, perhaps, I shall take these two pairs. But Louis XV heels are too high for me. Give me a size lower or, stay—perhaps Louis XIII will be high enough."—Harper's.

Cheese Industry.

One of the great milk markets is the cheese industry, which is concentrated in New York and Wisconsin. These states together make more than three-fourths of the national product. Their output is nearly equal, Wisconsin leading slightly. Michigan, Pennsylvania, California, Oregon, Illinois and Minnesota are, in the order named, the other principal cheese-making states. Nearly all the cheese is made in small factories. Wisconsin makes 47 per cent of the total.

Queen Poor Conversationalist.

Queen Mary is a poor conversationalist. On some one being brought up to her it is said she will begin to talk with remarkable felicity, setting the other at ease and delighting him. Then, all of a sudden, she suddenly ceases, an acute silence supervenes and the other does not know whether to break the pause or slip away. The fact is the queen talks well by dint of concentration; this does not always last until the end of the conversation, and once the thread is broken she grows abstracted, thinking of something else.

DID THE WORK

Grew Strong on Right Food.

You can't grow strong by merely exercising. You must have food—the kind you can digest and assimilate.

Unless the food you eat is digested it adds to the burden the digestive organs have naturally to carry. This often means a nervous breakdown.

"About a year ago," writes a Mass. lady, "I had quite a serious nervous breakdown caused, as I believed, by overwork and worry. I also suffered untold misery from dyspepsia.

"First I gave up my position, then I tried to find a remedy for my troubles, something that would make me well and strong, something to rest my tired stomach and build up my worn-out nerves and brain.

"I tried one kind of medicine after another, but nothing seemed to help me.

"Finally a friend suggested change of food and recommended Grape-Nuts. With little or no faith in it, I tried a package. That was eight months ago and I have never been without it since.

"Grape-Nuts did the work. It helped me grow strong and well. Grape-Nuts put new life into me, built up my whole system and made another woman of me!"

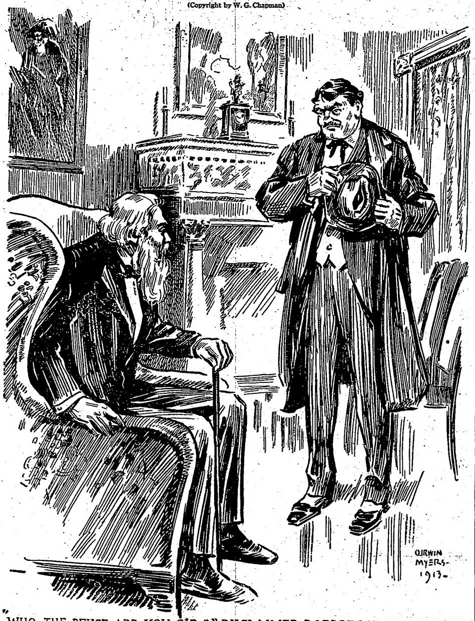
THE DEVIL CHAIR

A Chronicle of the Strange Adventures of John Haynes and His Gyroscope Vehicle

ROLES REVERSED

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman)



"WHO THE DEUCE ARE YOU, SIR?" EXCLAIMED ROBERTSON ANGRILY

No swindle on the grand scale was ever so successfully contrived as that of the Nokomis Land Company. The members of this organization had filched his western property from John Haynes, an Englishman; had torn him from his wife and daughter, crippled him with a treacherously fired bullet, and, while he lay helpless in the hospital, railroaded him into the penitentiary for fourteen years, under the name of Pete Timmons, a notorious gang leader. Then, giving out that Haynes had accepted a million dollars in settlement of his claims, and had gone back to England, they divided their plunder and went their several ways, while the new city of Nokomis, built on the stolen land, sprang into being and brought them ample and continuous incomes in the shape of house rents and sales on the installment basis.

The company was dissolved. There was nothing corporate for Haynes to seek to be avenged upon—when he came out. He could not sue the thousands of innocent property holders who had obtained their titles in good faith. Nor did he plan to do so. He had no confidence in justice; he himself would bring the conspirators to book. While working in the prison machine shop, he invented a powerful gyroscope, which, when attached to any vehicle, or to the feet, even, would carry the wearer at an incredible rate of speed along roads or railway lines. With the aid of this, he escaped, located his daughter, sent her to Chicago to await his summons, and then turned all his attention to finding his wife and wreaking vengeance upon his enemies.

Haynes knew that, like his daughter, his wife must have been told that he was dead. That was the reason why she had not sought him out. One man alone knew where she could be found: Chauncey E. Robertson, of Benderville, the corrupt lawyer who had betrayed him into the power of the more corrupt judge that had sentenced him while he lay helpless in prison, awaiting what he believed to be the continuation of his trial. Haynes did not know that he had been sentenced until the warders hustled him away from court, without permitting him to make a reply.

In the penitentiary, Haynes had worked out the intricacies of his revenge, and, with that fixed idea of the paranoiac who has been driven insane by wrongs, he determined that to each of his enemies should fall a recompense of the same nature as the injury which he had received from [illegible]. Torn between the desire of [illegible] vengeance and the need of driving a bargain with Robertson, in return for the information he needed, Haynes hurried to Benderville.

Nobody there had heard of Robertson. Certainly there was no man of such a name in Benderville—a small, straggling city of a few thousand souls, among whom no one could conceal himself successfully. On this point, John Haynes satisfied himself after a few days' inquiry. He thought at first that Robertson might be living there under an alias. But an old city directory knew Robertson and furnished his address—24 Main Avenue. There Haynes discovered a boarded, weather-worn house with shuttered windows. It had been closed five years and none of the neighbors had any knowledge as to its owner. Since Benderville was little more than five years old, it seemed reasonable to believe that no one now inhabiting that city knew or had ever known this man whom John Haynes sought.

Haynes was discouraged. Evidently his enemy had resolved to place himself beyond reach of retribution, and, taking his own share in the proceeds of the conspiracy, had fled to another part of the country. That night Haynes forced an entrance into the basement of the house, ascended the uncarpeted stairs, and emerged in the hallway where, striking a match, he lit the candle which he had brought with him and proceeded to make a systematic investigation.

He was surprised to find the house well furnished, even to the grand piano in the living room, there were pictures upon the walls and costly furniture and rich carpets. But the whole place was falling into decay. Dust covered everything with a thick layer of white, the paper was hanging in mildewed strips from the walls, the plaster cracking, and spider webs festooned each room. Evidently Robertson had bought the house with the intention of making it his permanent home; evidently, too, an after-decision, or some sudden access of panic, or the conviction that Benderville was not sufficiently remote from the scene of his exploits, had driven him to seek other refuge, and in such haste that he had not waited to dispose of his furnishings. Perhaps he had not dared to take the risk of returning.

Haynes looked round him and then perceived that there were footsteps in the dust that covered the carpet—steps other than his, and finger-marks upon the mahogany writing table.

Evidently this house had visitors—not burglars either, for they would have removed at least that ivory statuette upon the mantel, and the gilt clock that had run down—the books, too, that stood in dusty rows beside the window. Was it Robertson himself, perhaps, or some agent of his? If so, what did he come for?

Hayes found the half empty box of cigars in a drawer of the table, lit one, and kindling the charred logs with some scraps of newspaper—not without difficulty, for they were damp with mildew—stretched out his legs to the blaze and fell asleep, pondering.

When he awoke it was daylight. He started up in some confusion at first, not knowing where he was. Then, stretching himself and yawning, he rose to his feet and began to ponder upon the best means of effecting his escape unnoticed. As he stood before the shuttered window, gazing out through a chink at the deserted street, he heard a sharp click at the gate. A postman had dropped a letter into the box. Haynes hesitated; then, very deliberately, he unbolted the front door, walked down the patch of weed-grown garden, and took the letter.

It was addressed to Chauncey E. Robertson.

Then the man came there secretly, he thought, as he tore it open without compunction. He sat down in the library and read it. It began without address and briefly informed the recipient that he had opened a real estate office at a certain number in a downtown street in Omaha. There was no signature. But this was a clue.

Omaha lies some three hundred and fifty miles east of Benderville. That evening, John Haynes strapped on his gyroscope skates, and running swiftly along the railroad lines through the darkness, halting only to make a detour round the larger stations, he reached Omaha about two in the morning and made his way to the address given. It was a small, old building in an old part of the city: it was not guarded and it was easy to pick the lock of the entrance door with a skeleton key and to enter. Haynes found a little directory printed in black letters upon the wall. He looked for Robertson's name, and to his astonishment, he found:

HAYNES, JOHN, real estate, 44.

This was amazing. Haynes hastened up to the fourth story of the building where, in front of him, he saw his name again, painted upon the ground glass panels of a door which again informed him that he was in the real estate business. Two minutes later he was inside a tiny office, furnished with a single desk, on which was not a scrap of paper, and with a large safe of that late pattern which calls itself "the burglar's foe."

The chase was growing interesting. This office, like the house, was evidently a blind; Robertson was an adept at covering his tracks. But why had he selected Haynes' name as an alias? Evidently the safe would furnish valuable information, possibly embracing this fact. But Haynes examined it with increasing dismay. Nothing short of an electric drill and metal-melting apparatus would force it. It was controlled by a combination word-lock, but what word Robertson alone knew. If Haynes chose to remain until his enemy arrived in the morning he would undoubtedly hold him at his mercy. But Haynes did not intend to murder Robertson; his scheme was far more subtle—and besides, he must force him to confess where his wife was to be found.

There was nothing but to acknowledge defeat and go. Yet the man could not tear himself away, but kneeled before the safe and pulled now this way and now that, watching the letters pass across the lock. His fingers moved automatically, for his mind was elsewhere, and he did not know that he was making words in answer to the stimulus of the mental images. Suddenly he became aware, with awe and something almost approaching terror, that the safe door was open.

He looked at the word. "It was "Mary." His wife's name—for his thoughts had been of her; and that was the name Robertson had selected! A sudden flush of anger made his lips quiver and his face grew hot; then, swinging back the door, he reached in and drew out a bundle of papers.

They were letters, mostly, and as he read them he learned for the first time the full extent and ramifications of the plot which had been formed and put into execution against him; he understood, too, why Robertson, guilty as he was, dared not destroy this evidence which kept him secure against betrayal by the power that it gave him over his confederates.

When the conspirators, having secured John Haynes within the penitentiary at Nokomis Falls, spread the report that he had accepted one million dollars in settlement of his claim to an estate worth more than ten times that amount, this sum was detached from the total capital and became the spoil of Robertson, the lying lawyer who had betrayed Haynes to his enemies. Resolved to obviate all possibility of retribution, Robertson had removed to Benderville, where he took up his residence. But his uneasy fears would not leave him. At length, finding that life under his own name was intolerable, he hit upon the scheme of taking the name of his victim. He settled in Omaha as John Haynes, and lived upon the proceeds of the plunder, which brought him a substantial income. The house at Benderville he had not sold, partly because he feared to show himself there, partly because his avarice impelled him to hold on to a property which yearly appreciated in value. He also left a thousand dollars in the bank there, undisturbed. Of late, however, he had come to the resolution to cut the last connection with his past, and had employed an agent, who had been a minor member in the conspiracy, to visit the house by stealth and receive communications from him there addressed under his own name. He had rented the real estate office to cover his tracks in Omaha; when the sale was effected it was his plan to withdraw to Europe, there to dwell in security.

But the letters—to which he had clung in order to hold evidence against the rest of the gang in case he needed it—these afforded the reader for the first time a complete understanding of the scheme. Haynes learned to his amazement that no less a person than the governor of the state was implicated. He had then been a notoriously corrupt Senator; now he was Governor, and Robertson had not allowed the wretched man to forget his past. One letter, written in despair by Governor Harding himself, although not signed, implored Robertson's leniency in not insisting upon the vetoing of a certain bill. Another hinted at the place where Mary Haynes was concealed. And, as he read this, Haynes' heart leaped; now he knew that he could discover her abode at any time without the necessity of bargaining with Robertson. On him he could wreak vengeance to the full. And she still lived, thank God!

John Haynes placed the Governor's letters in his breast pocket, replacing the remaining papers in the safe, closed it, stole out, and locked the door again. There was now no sign that any midnight visitor had entered the real estate office. At four o'clock he stood upon the streets of Omaha. At six he was once more in Benderville; and ten minutes later he was back in Robertson's house.

That morning he took up his residence at the most fashionable hotel, signing his name as Chauncey E. Robertson upon the register. By nightfall all the town knew that Mr. Robertson had returned to live in the community. Next day the shutters upon the windows of the house were folded back and an army of workmen was placed at work upon its renovation. As the days passed, Haynes grew secure in the conviction that Robertson was personally unknown to anyone in Benderville. He made secret inquiries and discovered that none of the officials in the local bank had been there more than three years. Everything pointed to the success of his undertaking.

Haynes knew that, sooner or later, Robertson's agent would learn and bring him news concerning this bold usurpation of his principal's name and interests. But for more than two months nothing occurred. This suited the Englishman's plans, for, the longer the period that should elapse before the crisis arrived, the better he would be able to establish his identity in the town. He did not scruple to state that he had come from Nokomis, or that he had owned shares in the land company. To the full he adopted his enemy's personality, and when two months had passed and the house at last stood ready for his occupancy, he had become universally known as Robertson, and was considered a person of much importance at the local bank, where he had deposited the balance of the five thousand dollars that remained to him from the proceeds of an earlier exploit against one of the conspirators.

All this while Robertson made no move. In fact, it was not until eight weeks had elapsed that his agent, making his periodical visit to Benderville, learned to his amazement that Robertson had returned.

He hurried to the house, walked into the hall through the wide open door and into the dining room where Haynes was finishing a hearty meal. The Englishman rose and came forward with outstretched hand. He guessed instinctively who his visitor was.

"Good evening, sir," he said. "What can I have the pleasure of doing for you?"

The other looked at him and looked again. The face seemed familiar, and though he could not name the man his heart sank under a premonition of disaster.

"I want Mr. Robertson," he stammered.

"Yes," said Haynes. "I am Mr. Robertson. You may go, Paul," he added to the man-servant. "Now, sir, what can I do for you?"

"You are not Chauncey E. Robertson," muttered the other. "Who are you?"

Haynes pulled out his card-case and handed his visitor a card on which was engraved the name of Chauncey E. Robertson. "Evidently this is a case of mistaken identity," he said, smiling.

The other had been staring hard at him all the while. He knew him at last, though it was five years since they had met, when he was a poorly paid clerk in Robertson's law office at Nokomis.

"You're John Haynes," he whispered in terror, and his knees knocked together. He had read of the man's exploits, of his machine, his terrible vengeance. He sank into a chair.

"You haven't any grudge against me, sir?" he whined. "I knew nothing about it at all. Can't we make some arrangements?"

"I really fear you must be under some strange misapprehension, Mr.—Jenkins, isn't it?" said Haynes, the name of the cheap little clerk suddenly returning to him. "Why, Jenkins, although I haven't seen you since you were my law clerk in the Nokomis days, I hardly think this explains the purpose of this unexpected visit. You should have given me warning, Jenkins. Do you not remember that I used to have fainting fits when I argued cases before Judge Charteris?"

The wretched agent sank in his chair like a collapsed bladder, staring at Haynes with fishy eyes, listened in terror to this sarcastic outburst.

"By the way, Jenkins," Haynes continued, "I am glad that you have come here after all, for I have been anxious to discover the whereabout of a certain John Haynes. You remember him, doubtless? You will recall that case of mine, a very important one, in which this man Haynes laid claim to certain lands, the property of the Nokomis Land Company? We went all over the papers together, you will remember, and finally, as his lawyer, I advised Mr. Haynes that he had a case and that he should refuse to settle for less than a million dollars."

The agent rose up tremulously and drew near, fawning and rubbing his hands together.

"I can do anything for you, sir," he whispered. "I know where Mr. Robertson's to be found. You want him, don't you, sir?"

"I have heard," continued Haynes impassively, "that Mr. Haynes has opened a real estate office in Omaha. Probably you have not heard of it yet. wait!" He rose, went to his desk, and, extracting the letter which he had taken from the letter box two months before, handed it to Jenkins. "Read that!" he said sternly.

The agent was edging toward the door. He meant to run, as hard as he could, and never stop until he reached the depot, to take train there for Omaha. He would have been just as willing to conspire with Haynes, but this was unendurable, this mockery which wrung his soul with horror. If it should change to rage! He edged closer—and then Haynes leaped in front of him, shouting with laughter.

"Please wait a moment longer, Mr. Jenkins," he said. "Come into the library. Sit there!" He indicated the chair at the desk, and Jenkins sank into it. "Now take that pen and write to Mr. Haynes as I shall dictate. Are you ready? 'Dear Mr. Haynes: I have received your letter. It is necessary to come to Benderville by the first train. I have an immediate offer for the house at a figure which will surprise you, but it must be taken within forty-eight hours or the deal falls through. All is well. J.'"

When the other had finished, Haynes folded and stamped the envelope. "Now, Jenkins," he said, "you spoke of an 'arrangement.' What did you mean by an 'arrangement?'"

Jenkins, as if hypnotized, only stared, open-mouthed, at this terrible man.

"I tell you what arrangement I will make with you, Jenkins," continued Haynes. "You are employed in Nokomis still?"

"In Omaha," muttered the other.

"Correct, and I am glad you did not lie to me. Now, Jenkins, after our pardonable deception of your friend Mr. Haynes you will doubtless find the East more comfortable for you. Am I correct in that supposition? Good. Then—" He opened a spring drawer in the table—"here are two hundred and fifty dollars. Make your way to New York by the first train and stay there till the month is ended. If you go to Omaha," he added, "I'll kill you. Wait! Take this letter and post it on your way to the depot."

He watched the man slink down the street toward the letter-box, but did not even wait to see him drop the letter. He knew well enough the deadly fear which he had inspired; he knew, also, that Jenkins, terrified by the trap into which he had fallen, had been temporarily reduced to the condition of an automaton; that he would obey his command unquestioningly.

But Robertson did come. He arrived two evenings later, saw the house brilliantly lighted, and entered in some perplexity. Haynes was waiting for Robertson in the library, and hailed him as he passed by on his way to the reception room, where he imagined Jenkins to be waiting for him.

Robertson turned at the sound and came in quickly, looking in astonishment at the other. The voice seemed somehow not wholly unfamiliar, but the figure was that of an old, bent man and the face was nearly concealed under a profuse growth of hair and beard. Even Jenkins would not have recognized Haynes again in that disguise.

"Who the deuce are you, sir?" exclaimed Robertson angrily, as he entered. "I have been under the impression that this is my house, sir. What are you doing here?"

Graybeard rose chuckling and held out his hand.

"Mr. Robertson, I think," he said.

"Well, sir?"

"My name is Patterson. I have purchased this house—or rather have arranged to purchase it, through Mr. Jenkins, your agent. I have four thousand dollars in the Benderville bank to meet the first installment, and you shall have the balance of twenty-four thousand dollars in twenty-four monthly payments."

"But—but—" stammered Robertson.

"I understood from Mr. Jenkins that if you had not returned from Europe by the time the house was decorated I was to have free residence here pending your arrival. I moved in three days ago."

Robertson had never thought so hard before.

"To-morrow morning, Mr. Robertson," resumed the other, "we can transfer the title-deed, if you are agreed. I understand that it is at the bank now. And then we can sign the agreement."

Robertson's brow cleared; he smiled and, sitting down, bit off the end of a cigar. Of course! What an ass he had been so nearly to betray himself. He had not hoped to get more than $25,000 at most, and here Jenkins had obtained three thousand dollars more.

"By all means, Mr. Patterson," he said pleasantly. "I hope you will forgive my abruptness. At what hour will it suit you to be at the bank?"

"How would eleven do?" asked Graybeard. "I can step into my lawyer's office and have him meet us in the directors' room. That will enable us to wind up the affair in a single session."

"That will suit me admirably," said Robertson. His caution had been completely overcome by avarice. It would be the work of a few minutes only to complete the formalities and then he would arrange to have the monthly installments sent to London and leave America forever. After a few trivial remarks he rose and took his leave cordially.

When he had gone Haynes went to the telephone and called up police headquarters. Afterward he telephoned his banker at his residence.

"Well, gentlemen, here we are," smiled the old man as he welcomed Robertson in the directors' room on the following morning. "Mr. Robertson," he continued, "you are, I believe, almost a stranger here. Allow me to introduce you to Mr. Carpenter, a director of the bank. Mr. Carpenter's assistants," he continued, waving his hand comprehensively toward two gentlemen with large, unpolished boots, who sat behind the table rather glumly. "Mr. Robertson—my lawyer, Mr. Franks. Mr. Franks, have you the title-deed ready?"

Franks placed it upon the table and Robertson read it over carefully. Then taking a pen from Carpenter, he held it over the document.

"Where shall I sign?" he asked.

"You may sign here," said Franks. "But not unless you want to," he added impressively.

"Why, of course I want to," said Robertson genially. "It isn't often a man refuses to sign for eight and twenty thousand dollars, is it?" He wrote his name in a large, legible hand.

Then Haynes took off his beard and the two men rose from where they were seated and stood one on each side of Robertson.

"Come along," said one of them briskly.

"I beg your pardon!" said Robertson briskly. Then, as he turned, he found himself looking into the face of Haynes. He knew him at once. He gasped, staggered, fell backward; and the handcuffs were snapped on his wrists.

"What is the charge?" he muttered as they helped him to the door.

"Forgery," replied the lawyer curtly.

Robertson felt the net close round him. How could he deny himself, he who was known to all his friends in Omaha as Haynes? He could not call on anyone in Nokomis to identify him. He had forged his own name for $28,000.

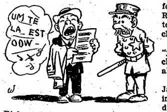
Youth Fails to Warble and Lands in Lockup

NEW YORK.—When James Smith, eighteen years old, of 19 Mechanic street, New Rochelle, was sentenced to 60 days in prison for petty larceny by Justices O'Keefe, Herrman and Salmon in special sessions he said he had been led to steal by going to church for the first time in his recollection. Recently his father, who is a postman, took him to task for not being a church attendant.



"Son," said the elder Smith, "you're going to the bad. Go to church instead. You'll never get ahead in this world until you do."

So on the last Sunday in March James joined the faithful who went into the mission at 35 West One Hundred and Thirty-fifth street. Rev, Richard Bolden was holding forth on the beauty of a righteous life. Deeply touched, James knelt with the others in prayer.

On his way out three overcoats found their way across his arm. James walked sanctimoniously away until he reached One Hundred and Thirty-first street and Madison avenue.

There he was stopped by Patrolman Hart, who noticed a sheaf of sacred music protruding from the coat that belonged to the minister.

"Stop!" said the policeman. "Where are you going?"

"To church," answered James. "I sing in the choir."

"But what are you doing with those coats?"

"Taking them to give away to the poor."

The policeman fingered them suspiciously and then he looked more closely at the music.

"This music is in Latin," he exclaimed. "Can you sing it?"

"Sure," replied James, who knew several Italians.

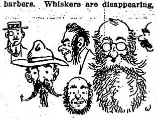
"Then sing it now," ordered the policeman.

James was reluctant, declaring he was not accustomed to singing Latin on street corners. At length he yielded to urgent prompting. The policeman listened as long as he could.

"That'll do," he said finally. "You'd better come along to the stationhouse and resign from the choir."

No More Fur on Upper Lips; Barber's Swan Song

CHICAGO.—"In the course of a few years," sighed C. Albert Bucks, Chicago's most veteran barber, the other day, "whiskers will be as extinct as the American buffalo. And so will barbers. Whiskers are disappearing, and they are very seldom to be met, even in a barber shop. I cut whiskers in the early '70s which a barber of today wouldn't understand."



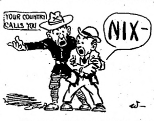
Mr. Bucks has been cutting whiskers since the year 1869, and this is his official swan song.

"Look," said he, indicating the beardless face of a youthful customer in the chair beneath him. "Once the American youth was a fur-bearing animal, as luxurious on the face as the German, Spaniard or the Alaskan yak. He used to wear whiskers all over, and few faces in those happy days were complete without at least one set of trimmings."

"A young man then was as proud of his whiskers as of his wife. He used to come to his barber every day to have them treated scientifically. He used to brush his hair from the back out and make it stick from his forehead like this" (illustrating).

Peaceful Married Man Was Almost Shanghaied

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—The papers had just been coming out with big evening headlines of reports of the taking of Vera Cruz. A certain citizen of the neighborhood of Seventeenth street and Susquehanna avenue was going home along Broad street from Columbia avenue about nine o'clock in the evening. He was full of war spirit.



As the enthusiastic citizen reached the south corner of the Second regiment armory, at Broad and Diamond, he noticed a crowd about the doorway in the middle of the building. He sped up to see what was the excitement.

As he shouldered his way through the crowd a husky lad in state blue grabbed the citizen by the arm.

"Come on in!" he shouted. "The regiment needs men!"

The enthusiastic citizen dragged back. "Men?" shouted he, in turn. "You're crazy. I got a wife and child."

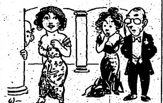
"Well, that don't disqualify you," argued the guardsman.

The man from Seventeenth and Susquehanna took wild umbrage at this. "I can lick the man who says I ain't patriotic!" says he.

The married man indignantly wended his way along Susquehanna avenue home. "Well, what do you know about that?" he growled, under his diminutive mustache. "Shanghai-ing! On a respectable uptown street."

Woman at Ball in Pantalets Causes Sensation

BOSTON, MASS.—Boston society is gasping over the first appearance of pantalets in the Back Bay. They were worn by Mrs. Liontine Lovewell at the ball of the Massachusetts Federation of Progressive Women at the Copley-Plaza. Had she but known how much attention her new gown would attract, Mrs. Lovewell might not have worn it, she said.



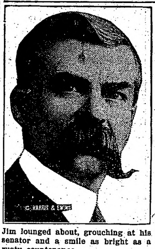
Skirts with the pantalet effect have been seen in Boston, but it was the first time a garment of this kind had come into view here. Those present gazed at it almost continuously throughout the evening. Some women were simply dumfounded. Others said it was not so bad, and added that they may later adopt the style.

The men liked it. Among those most interested was ex-Mayor John F. Fitzgerald. The new gown, which Mrs. Lovewell brought here from New York, is really a beauty. The skirt is pink crepe with a liberal slit in front. On the skirt are brown maline flowers, which add much to its loveliness.

The waist is ecru lace with morning glory trimmings. The Parisian pantalets are of pink crepe de chine down to the knees and ecru accordion plaited lace below, held in about the ankle with French rosebuds.

Mrs. Lovewell wore slippers of pink and white satin brocade, with hand-painted heels backed with rhinestones and the same kind of buckles. She also wore a dance cap of gold lace thread topped with pink rosebuds. There was no petticoat.

ONE BY SENATOR WALSH



© HARRIS & EWING

Senator Thomas J. Walsh of Montana hails from a big country, and one of the few in which the Indian is still remaining on reservations. In his state are what are thought to be the fiercest of the redskin tribes, the Cheyennes, while another famous agency is that of the Rosebud Indians. From a grazing state, over which once roamed immense herds of cattle, this country is rapidly becoming agricultural.

In such a prosperous community there is always plenty of work to be found, but the senator tells a story of a man out his way who did his work vicariously. Jim Jones was a ne'er-do-well; loafing his principal occupation and sponging on others his only industry. He never displayed any energy except at meals.

His brother did most of the supporting of the entire family, but at one time even that down-trodden member happened not to have any position. Jim lounged about, grouching at his hard luck. Then one day he met the senator and a smile as bright as a new engagement ring illuminated his rusty countenance.

"Why, Jim, you seem happy!" exclaimed the senator. "What's the glad news? Must have had some good luck come your way."

"I have!" cried Jim, throwing out his chest with pride. "My brother has just gotten a new job!"

COMES OF NAVAL STOCK

Charles Johnstone Badger, in command of the fleet at Vera Cruz, was born in Rockville, Md., on August 6, 1853. He was the son of Commodore Oscar Charles Badger and Margaret M. Badger. An appointment at large to Annapolis was given the present rear admiral by President Grant in 1869, and four years later the young sailor graduated with the title of midshipman.

In July, 1874, he was commissioned an ensign, was given the title of master in November, 1879, and was raised to the rank of lieutenant (junior grade) in 1883. In 1886 he became a lieutenant. From September, 1873, until July, 1875, he was aboard the Narragansett, engaged in making a survey of the Gulf of California, and from October, 1875, until December, 1875, he was on duty at the navy yard in Washington.

He then was transferred to the torpedo boat Alarm for six months, then to the Asiatic station, with the Ashuelot, Alert, Monocacy, and Monongahela, and in December, 1879, was assigned to special duty with the bureau of navigation.

He then spent some time with the coast survey steamers Endeavor and A. D. Bache, and was switched to the Yantic on the north Atlantic station. In October, 1882, he was on duty at the Boston navy yard, and then was ordered to the fish commission steamer Fish Hawk.

Perhaps the most dramatic part of his career was that of taking part in Schley's relief expedition to find Greely, who was lost somewhere near the North pole. Badger was the executive and navigating officer of the Alert, being second in command.

He was in command of the naval forces on the water front in San Francisco during the earthquake, and helped the stricken city greatly by aiding in the transfer of naval supplies.

BRAND WHITLOCK IN HIS NEW ROLE

© HARRIS & EWING

Brand Whitlock, the new American minister, is now settled in the new legation at the end of Rue Belliard, one of the best residential streets in Brussels, and very suitable for a permanent home for representatives of the United States.

Before Mr. Whitlock became a full-fledged diplomat he was mayor of Toledo four terms, succeeding "Golden Rule" Jones as the friend of the people; before that he was a successful lawyer, and is an author of note.

Hugh S. Gibson has begun his work as secretary of legation at Brussels, to which position he was promoted from secretary of legation in Cuba, previous to which he had been second secretary to the American embassy in London and secretary of legation in Honduras.

Col. John S. Parke has gone to Washington, having finished his term as military attache. Belgians deeply regret having to lose him, as he and his wife have been very popular on account of their charming hospitality.

MRS. JOHN LIND, WOMAN OF THE WEST

Among women of today a personality of particular interest is that of Mrs. John Lind, wife of President Wilson's recent envoy to Mexico. Mrs. Lind accompanied her husband on his diplomatic mission into that country, and with him spent several months in the city, which is now a center of interest in the world.

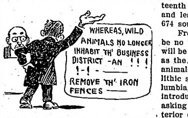
Before her marriage Mrs. Lind was Miss Alice Sheperd. She comes of old Pilgrim stock, her ancestors having come over to America in the days of the Mayflower. The Rev. Thomas Poletiah Sheperd, one of her forefathers, was many generations ago one of the pastors in the early American colony. Another built the first boat that ever plowed the waves of Lake Erie.

Mrs. Lind herself was born in Wisconsin. The spirit of the West permeates her tastes in large degree. She loves the freedom of outdoor life, delights in fine horses, and is a good rider and expert swimmer. In talking with Mrs. Lind one realizes that it is probably to her athletic tendencies that she owes her clear complexion and her splendid health. She is the mother of two boys and two girls.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

"It Ain't a Menagerie; Pull Down the Fence!"

WASHINGTON.—From an obscure corner of the congressional directory and a not overly well-known portion of the state of Indiana, steps into the limelight, one Henry A. Barnhart, member of congress from the Thirteenth district of the Hoosier state, and leader of a constituency of 258,674 souls.



WHEREAS, WILD ANIMALS NO LONGER INHABIT TH' BUSINESS DISTRICT -AN !!! !-! - REMOVE TH' IRON FENCES

From May 1, 1914, until time shall be no more, the Indiana congressman will be canonized on the pages of fame as the man who discovered that wild animals no longer roam the granolithic sidewalks of the District of Columbia, and the man who accordingly introduced a resolution in congress asking that Secretary Lane of the interior department pull down the high picket fence that surrounds his bailiwick. With a flowing wealth of legislative parlance, including sonorous and euphonic phrases, the "gentleman from Indiana" introduced his resolution in the house the other day.

It seems that at some time or other, the picket fence surrounding the Department of the Interior building, on the block bounded by Seventh, Ninth, F and G streets northwest, has held the attention of the Indiana congressman.

Lifting one hand majestically toward the skylight, Mr. Barnhart said:

"Mr. Speaker," he announced, "this is my resolution:

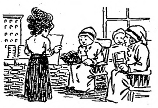
"Whereas, wild animals no longer infest the business district of the national capital and horses, cattle and hogs are no longer permitted to roam at large therein, and,

"Whereas, ours is a nation of civilized people without need of restraint by barrier of high fences; therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, that the secretary of the interior be, and hereby is, authorized to remove the iron fences now surrounding the buildings occupied by the department of the interior and the general land office."

Tests Show the Value of Fresh Air Schools

THAT school children who are taught in fresh-air classrooms advance more rapidly in their studies and make greater improvement in weight and strength than children in regular classrooms is a conclusion demonstrated by Frank H. Mann of New York before the sociological section of the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis. The speaker reported on a series of experiments carried on jointly by the New York committee on the prevention of tuberculosis and the board of education, in which three groups of children were studied to note the effect of fresh air upon them.

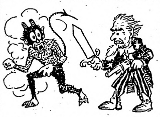


In one group the children were placed in fresh-air classes and were fed during school hours with milk and crackers morning and afternoon; in the second group the children were left in the ordinary classroom under regular conditions. Every effort was made to eliminate or equalize in the comparison such variable factors as age, home conditions, physical condition, school conditions, nativity, etc. The two groups of children in the fresh-air classes were all undernourished and anemic at admission.

The results of this experiment, extending from September to June, showed that all of the poorly nourished and anemic children in the fresh-air classes gained in weight, red corpuscles in the blood, general nutrition and physical tone.

Effort to Stop Traffic in Habit-Forming Drugs

IN A desperate effort to stop the traffic in habit-forming drugs in the United States, such as opium, cocaine, morphine and heroin, congress will, within the next few weeks, place upon the statute books a law that is more drastic than anything ever before attempted along this line. This law, the consideration of which by the senate committee on finance has been delayed for many months, will require that every person who imports, manufactures, sells or gives away opium, morphine, coca leaves, cocaine or any of their derivatives or preparations shall register his name with the collector of internal revenue of the district.

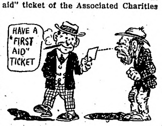


Further, he shall not sell this opium, cocaine, heroin or morphine except in pursuance of a written order on a form to be issued in blank for that purpose by the commissioner of internal revenue of the United States treasury department. This order shall be kept on file for a period of two years by the dealer so that it may be accessible for inspection by federal and state officials. The purchaser of these drugs must keep a duplicate of the form for similar inspection.

In other words, if a citizen is addicted to the use of opium or cocaine, and purchases either of these drugs, he must be on public record as a drug fiend and the dealer on record as a person who is willing to sell to the unfortunates.

"Business" Is Now Dead for Capital's Beggars

"PANHANDLERS" who hang out under the trees along Pennsylvania avenue a few blocks from the treasury have come to the conclusion that "business" here is "dead." The "first aid" ticket of the Associated Charities is blamed by the beggars. The nickels and dimes obtained from citizens of prosperous appearance during the old rich years have gone. Instead the "panhandler" now is given a "first aid" ticket.



HAVE A "FIRST AID" TICKET

When somebody devised the ticket plan packages of the tickets, done up like mileage books, were issued to the business and professional men of Washington.

The "first aid" ticket is the printed application of a citizen for help on behalf of some individual who is supposed to need it. So far the plan has worked well, hence the complaint of the beggars that "business" is poor.

There was a time in Washington when an alert panhandler could net $4 to $6 on any pleasant summer evening—all in money, mostly nickels and dimes. But now times have changed. Within the past few weeks Washington has been flooded with "first aid" tickets and the tired business man, instead of shelling out his nickel or his dime, tears off a "first aid" ticket and goes his way rejoicing.

The officials of the Associated Charities are pleased with the plan. They say that a man really needing help will come to them, get what he requires and subject his case to the investigation of the charity workers. If he's a professional he wants cash and cash only and he never comes

Great Ocean Liner Sinks

* * *

Tragedy Rivals Titanic Disaster

STEAMER CARRIES 969 PASSENGERS DOWN TO DEATH

EMPRESS OF IRELAND SANK WITHIN FIFTEEN MINUTES AFTER BEING RAMMED BY COLLIER.

OF 1,387 ON CANADIAN PACIFIC SHIP, 418 SAVED

Hundreds Did Not Even Have Time to Get on Deck and Possibly Never Realized What Had Happened—Within Sight of Land in St. Lawrence.

Rimouski, Que., June 1.—Sinking in 90 feet of water within 15 minutes after being rammed amidships in the upper reaches of the St. Lawrence river, the Canadian Pacific liner Empress of Ireland carried down with her more than 900 of her passengers and crew.

Looming up through the river mists as the Empress of Ireland was lying to, waiting for the fog to lift or day to break, the Danish collier Storstad crashed bow on into the side of the big Canadian liner, striking her about midway of her length and ripping her side open clear to the stern.

Crash Close to Shore.

The crash occurred not far from the shore off Father Point, 150 miles from Quebec, which the Empress of Ireland left Thursday afternoon bound for Liverpool, and ten miles from this point on the St. Lawrence. In reality therefore although the liner was heading for the sea and the collier coming in from it, the disaster was not one of the ocean but of the river.

Unlike the Titanic's victims, the Empress of Ireland's lost their lives within sight of shore—in land-locked waters.

S. O. S. Calls Sounded.

Immediately the ship's crew recovered from the shock of the collision and it was seen that the liner had received a vital blow, a wireless "S. O. S." call was sounded.

The hurried appeal was picked up by the government mail tender Lady Evelyn here and the government pilot boat Eureka at Father Point and both at once set out to the rescue. So deep was the hurt of the Empress, however, and so fast the inrush of water, that long before either of the rescue boats could reach the scene, the liner had gone done.

But Few Afloat.

Only floating wreckage and a few life boats and rafts from the steamer, buoying up less than a third of those who had set sail on her, were to be found.

The rest had sunk with the liner, had been crushed to death in the Storstad's impact with her, or had been forced from exhaustion and exposure in the ice-chilled northern waters to loose their hold on bits of wreckage that had supported them and had drowned.

Accounts agree that in the brief space of time—not more than 14 minutes—between the shock of the collision and the sinking of the liner, there was little chance for systematic marshalling of the passengers. Indeed, everything indicates that hundreds of those on the steamer probably never reached the decks. Very few women were among the saved, not more than a dozen, the lists make it appear.

All Happened Very Quickly.

"It all happened so quickly that we did not really know what was going on and nobody had time to even cry 'Women first,'" one of the passengers told Captain Bellinger of the rescue boat Eureka.

"The stewards did not have time to rouse the people from their berths," the survivors added. "Those who heard the frenzied calls of the officers for the passengers to hurry on deck, lost no time in obeying them, rushing up from their cabins in scanty attire. They piled into the boats, which were rapidly lowered and were rowed away. Many who waited to dress were drowned."

A Tremendous Explosion.

The horror of the interval during which the Empress of Ireland was rapidly filling and the frightened throngs on board her were hurrying every effort to escape before she sank, was added to by a tremendous explosion which quickly followed the ripping and tearing given the liner by the Storstad's bow. According to one of the rescued, the explosion, probably caused by the water reaching the boilers, bulged the liner's sides and catapulted people from her deck into the sea.

The ship's heavy list as the water pouring in weighted her on the side she was struck made the work of launching boats increasingly difficult from moment to moment and when she finally took her plunge to the bottom scores still left on her decks were carried down in the vortex, only a few being able to clear her sides and find support on pieces of wreckage.

Empress Built in 1906.

The Empress of Ireland was built in 1906. It was a twin-screw steamer, 584 feet long, with all modern equipment, including wireless and submarine signaling.

The steamer Storstadt, Captain Anderson, is a vessel of 3,561 tons registered, built for the coal trade, and is capable of carrying 7,000 tons dead weight. It has been engaged for some time carrying coal between Sydney, Quebec and Montreal. It had a crew of about forty-eight men.

Location of Tragedy.

Father Point, near which the collision occurred, is 155 miles down the St. Lawrence river from Quebec at the head of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

The residents of Rimouski, numbering 3,000, came silently to the dock where the dead and exhausted living were being landed, and under the direction of the mayor, H. R. Fiset, gave whatever aid possible. Every doctor in the town was on the scene, and many of the injured were taken to private homes.

Great Ocean Disasters.

Other Great Ocean Disasters.
The loss of life on the Empress of Ireland has been equaled or exceeded only by four marine disasters in the last century. These were:
The Rhone, Wye and other vessels at St. Thomas, Oct. 29, 1867, 1,000 perished.
The excursion boat General Slocum, East River, New York, une 15 1904, 1,000 perished.
The Titanic, April 14, 1912, 1,490 lost.
The Kickemaru, Sept. 28, 1912, 1,000 lost.
Other disasters approximated in loss the fatality list of the Empress of Ireland were:
The Princess Alice, Sept. 3, 1818, 700 lost.
The Ertogrual, Sept. 19, 1890, 540 lost.
Utopia, March 17, 1891, 574 lost.
Norge, June 25, 1894, 600 lost.
La Bourgoyne, July 4, 1893, 571 lost.
Japanese battleship Mikasa, Sept. 12, 1905, 599 lost.

Captain Kendall Famous.

Chicago, Ill., June 1.—Captain Kendall, commander of the Empress of Ireland, won lasting fame in the annals of crime detection in 1910, when he was the hero of the capture of Dr. Hawley H. Crippen, American dentist, wanted in London for the murder of his wife, Belle Elmore. The arrest of Crippen was accomplished by Captain Kendall by the use of keen perception and judgment, aided by the wireless apparatus on the steamer Montrose, of which he was captain at that time.

Salvation Army Mournful.

Montreal, June 1.—With memories of the tune which was played on the Titanic until it went down, heart heavy with the loss of their many comrades on the Empress of Ireland, the Salvation Army of Peterboro passed through the streets of Montreal with brass band playing "Nearer My God to Thee." The little band have been despatched to replace their comrades who perished on their way to attend the International Salvation Army congress in London.

CAPTAIN DENIES STORSTAD WAS TO BLAME FOR WRECK

Montreal, June 2.—The other side of the story of the collision in the St. Lawrence river between the Canadian Pacific liner Empress of Ireland and the Norwegian collier Storstad which resulted in the sinking of the liner with the loss of more than 950 lives, was told by the master of the Storstad, who denies the charge that he was responsible for the disaster.

Kendall Laid Blame.

Captain H. G. Kendall of the Empress of Ireland, in his testimony before the coroner at Rimouski, placed the blame for the crash upon the collier, declaring the Norwegian steamer had been amply warned by signals of the Empress' presence, but had run the liner down while the Empress was virtually stationary.

He also charged that his plea that the collier keep her bow in the gash it had made in the side of the liner had been disregarded with apparent deliberation, causing the Empress to fill rapidly and sink within a few minutes.

Anderson Issues Statement.

Captain Thomas Anderson of the Storstad had remained silent on the subject of the collision until reaching Montreal, his destination.

After he had made a report to representatives of the Dominion Coal company, charterers of the vessel, and to the owners of the steamer, a statement based on his declarations to them was given out in which he enters a general denial of the charges and asks that the public withhold its opinion until all facts connected with the accident are known.

With her bows crumpled in and twisted around at an acute angle to port, and a gap showing on the port side only a foot or so above the water line, the Storstad showed evidence of the tragedy in which she figured as she limped into harbor here. A few minutes later a warrant of arrest, taken out by the Canadian Pacific railway, was nailed to her mainmast by order of W. Simpson Walker, king's counsellor, registrar of the Quebec admiralty.

C. P. R. Orders Her Seizure.

The seizure of the Storstad was at the instance of the Canadian Pacific railway company, whose claim against the owners of the collier, the Maritime Steamship company of Norway, is for $2,000,000 loss. There may be a further claim by the Canadian Pacific railway for loss of cargo. The owners of the Storstad will, it is understood, put up bonds today, so that the vessel may be released. No inconvenience will be caused by the arrest, as in the meantime the collier will be unloading her cargo of 11,500

Traces of Experiences.

The officers and men of the Storstad bore traces of their harrowing experiences. When questioned on the subject of the disaster they were averse to entering into conversation.

Captain Anderson declined at first to discuss the disaster, declaring that he would make a statement later. Subsequently a statement based on Captain Anderson's report, as well as the reports of other officers to Messrs. Lange and Griffin, was given out.

According to the captain of the Empress of Ireland, the Storstad did not back away after the collision. On the contrary, it now is stated, she steamed ahead in an effort to keep her bow in the hole she had dug into the side of the Empress.

Empress Headed Away.

The Empress, however, according to the Storstad's officers, headed away and bent the Storstad's bow over at an acute angle to port. After that the Empress was hidden from the view of the Storstad, and, despite the fact that the Storstad kept her whistle blowing she could not locate the Empress until the cries of some of the victims in the water were heard.

Captain Anderson absolutely denied that he moved a mile or so away from the Empress after his vessel struck the liner. The Storstad had not moved. It was the Empress, which had changed position, he declared.

According to the report made by Captain Anderson to the owners, immediately the collision occurred, he heard Captain Kendall shout, calling him not to pull away.

"I won't," shouted the Storstad's captain, as loud as he could. After that the Empress disappeared from the Storstad's view.

The Storstad picked up about 350 persons after the collision.

25 Buildings are Destroyed.

Towanda, Pa., May 29.—Two persons were probably fatally injured and property was damaged to the extent of thousands of dollars as the result of a severe wind and electrical storm. Lightning caused many fires and about 25 buildings were destroyed by fire and wind.

REPRESENTATION BY REBELS DISCUSSED

REALLY UP TO U. S. WHETHER CARRANZA GETS VOICE IN MEDIATION.

MANY CONFERENCES ARE HELD

Constitutionalist Representative Returns From Europe and Secret Discussions are Had in Washington —Much Speculation.

Niagara Falls, Ont., June 2.—Upon the Washington government depends whether the mediators will receive representatives of the Mexican Constitutionalists. The South American envoys, it has become known, have virtually resolved to go ahead with their plans for a two-party agreement between the United States and the Huerta government and for the time being ignore the question of Constitutionalist representation.

The only thing that might disturb such a course would be a direct intimation from the United States that it will withhold approval of the plans outlined for a new provisional government unless disposition is promptly made of the subject of the Constitutionalist participation. The Mexican delegates have had no conversations with the mediators on this point.

Each side here is waiting on the other to make the first move. The Huerta delegates expect to receive General Huerta's approval of the essentials of the peace plan, together with his opinion of some of the names suggested for the new government, today. The American delegates have already received much information along this line from Washington, but no intimation as to how far they should press the subject of Constitutional representation.

May Define Attitudes.

There is to be a conference, at which the attitude of both the mediators may be more clearly defined. Should the American delegates consent to go ahead with their earlier work on the peace plan, the mediators will continue their efforts toward an agreement. Eventually, it is their purpose to answer General Carranza's latest communication, but a change in their attitude toward the Constitutionalists may result from an insistence on the part of the American delegates that no agreement can be signed until the third element in the controversy is given opportunity to express its views.

Rebels Hold Conference.

Washington.—While Mexican mediation at Niagara Falls awaits word from the Washington and Huerta governments as to proposed terms of settlement of the present international differences and composition of the internal Mexican situation, prominent agents of the Constitutionalist movement in Mexico conferred here with Luis Cabrera as the center of interest.

It again was declared that this government is still firmly of the mind that no protocol which would outline terms of settlement of the general political affairs of Mexico, should be signed until agents of General Carranza had been given an opportunity to participate in the deliberations.

The belief in official circles here, however, is that the publication of the Carranza note to the South American mediators and the answer of the mediators thereto may be delayed for some days, pending further efforts on the part of this government to bring influence to bear which would assure some sort of representation at Niagara Falls of the Constitutionalist movement.

Presidential Possibilities.

While officially uninformed about what is going on behind the doors of the conference hall at the Falls or the name of those Mexicans who are being considered for the proposed provisional government, the three Constitutionalists leaders were plainly interested in Felix Diaz, presidential candidate, whose representatives twice have appeared at Niagara Falls, and Vasquez Gomez, a prominent Mexican, who was an adherent of Madero, but who has not allied himself with the present Constitutionalist movement under Carranza. Gomez left Mexico after the accession of Huerta to power and has since lived in the United States, though maintaining constant touch with his friends in the Mexican capital.

When Luis Cabrera, whom General Carranza hurriedly summoned from Europe, reached Washington, he was met by Rafael Zubaran, minister of the interior in the Carranza cabinet, and Jose Vasconcelos, a second emissary of the northern Mexican leader. The three were together throughout the day and also were in touch with their legal advisers, through whom they maintain communication with the Washington government.

Suspects Shoot Officer.

Saskatoon, Sask., June 2.—J. B. Chivas, justice of the peace, was shot dead at Amisk, Sask., while attempting to arrest three men suspected of breaking into the Canadian Pacific section house at Rosyth. The murder took place in the village restaurant, where Chivas, accompanied by J. Lees and P. Lawless, whom he had enrolled as special constables, went in order to locate the men whom he had been advised by telephone from the Royal Northwest Mounted police to arrest and hold.

STATE BREVITIES

Cannon Falls.—J. A. Schumacker of Duluth, grand master workman of the A. O. U. W., was here and initiated nine candidates.

Hayfield.—H. M. Hagestead, proprietor of the Hayfield hotel, will erect a new modern brick building on the site of his building.

Winthrop.—The Union Congregational church of this place will entertain the western conference of Congregational churches.

Winona.—The program is out for the annual Winona district Epworth league convention, which is to be held at Preston June 10 to 12 in connection with a Sunday school institute.

Tower.—The Tower-Soudan school board has elected Charles Rheinhold of Philadelphia principal of the Tower school and Joseph Koucky of Grand Forks, N. D., principal of the Soudan school.

Albert Lea.—The unveiling of the G. A. R. monument will take place Thursday, June 11, instead of Saturday, June 13, as had been announced. Former Governor S. R. Van Sant will make the address.

Buhl.—Grimed and tired fire-fighters continue to battle against a wall of forest-consuming flames near this village. Advancing fires threaten to wipe out the houses about the Cypress mine, a few miles from here. Only a heavy shower can save the camp, according to the firemen.

Albert Lea.—A telegram from A. J. Chesley of the state university hospital in Minneapolis, informed local physicians that the brain of the dog sent there was infected with rabies and advised all those who were bitten here to come at once for free treatment. Lillian Nelson, Irving Frye and Andrew Mickelson, three of the victims, left for the university hospital today.

Fergus Falls.—Mrs. R. R. Patterson, wife of the leading banker of Henning, committed suicide, according to information received by the coroner here. She had been in poor health and was despondent. Securing a revolver from her husband's desk in the bank, she secreted it in her clothing and took it to her room, when she shot herself in the head, dying instantly.

Albert Lea.—Fifteen dogs, which were bitten by a mad dog that ran wild on business streets here, have been put to death by the police. Owing to the inability to determine how many dogs have been infected, Mayor Harm has ordered owners to keep their dogs tied for the next thirty days. Three persons who were bitten are receiving treatment at the state university hospital.

Fergus Falls.—Mrs. Ingeborg Solum has begun a contest in probate court here to set aside the will of her father, the late Peter O. Haugen. Mr. Haugen owned 210 acres of land. He was twice married and had one daughter by his first wife and one by his second. He left all of his property to his second wife and her daughter, and did not mention Mrs. Solum, who is his daughter by his first wife.

Fergus Falls.—The finance committee of the city council has recommended that a special election be called for the purpose of voting on a bond issue of $40,000 for street improvements and the purchase of road-making machinery. It is planned to pave the principal business streets and oil some of the residence streets, and to distribute the cost of the paving over a period of fifteen years.

Mankato.—Old settlers of Sterling, Mapleton and other townships are preparing to hold a picnic on June 9 at the Judge Cornell grove in Old Mapleton. This picnic dates back several years, and is looked upon as one of the big annual events of the summer. The principal speaker will be John D. Deets of Mankato. It is also expected Governor A. O. Eberhart and J. W. Washburn of Duluth will be present.

Crookston.—The arrest by Sheriff Kelly and Officer Younke of Joseph Laconnte of Malone and Fred Laconnte of Thief River Falls and Geo. Provest of Louisville, charged with the murder of Charles Landa, a farmer of Polk county, near Wiley, promises to unravel the mystery of the disappearance of Landa 14 years ago. He left his home the afternoon of July 18, 1900 to take a train at Wiley for Crookston, his destination being Nebraska, where he intended to buy land. That was the last his family heard of him. He had considerable money with him. The present arrests were made as the result of rumors heard by his son, Albert Landa, and reported to County Attorney Boughton of Red Lake county. After investigation, Mr. Boughton determined that the crime had been committed in Polk county and turned the case over to County Attorney Hagen and Sheriff Kelly. It is said the authorities here have information regarding the location of the body of Landa and developments are expected soon.

Fergus Falls.—The city council has decided by a vote of five to three not to appeal from the decision of Judge Roeser, of the district court, who held that the Fergus brewery had a right to sell beer here for outside consumption, regardless of the provisions of the city charter. The court held that the charter provision was contrary to the general policy of the state of Minnesota. The council would have taken an appeal but for the fact that the city attorney discovered a provision that had been inserted in the 1913 laws granting breweries this right regardless of charter provisions.

MRS. LYON'S ACHES AND PAINS

Have All Gone Since Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Terre Hill, Pa.—"Kindly permit me to give you my testimonial in favor of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. When I first began taking it I was suffering from female troubles for some time and had almost all kinds of aches—pains in lower part of back and in sides, and pressing down pains. I could not sleep and had no appetite. Since I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound the aches and pains are all gone and I feel like a new woman. I cannot praise your medicine too highly."—Mrs. AUGUSTUS LYON, Terre Hill, Pa.

It is true that nature and a woman's work has produced the grandest remedy for woman's ills that the world has ever known. From the roots and herbs of the field, Lydia E. Pinkham, forty years ago, gave to womankind a remedy for their peculiar ills which has proved more efficacious than any other combination of drugs ever compounded, and today Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is recognized from coast to coast as the standard remedy for woman's ills.

In the Pinkham Laboratory at Lynn, Mass., are files containing hundreds of thousands of letters from women seeking health—many of them openly state over their own signatures that they have regained their health by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound; and in some cases that it has saved them from surgical operations.

SYNOPSIS.

Challis Wrandall is found murdered in a road house near New York. Mrs. Wrandall is summoned from the city and identifies the body. A young woman who accompanied Wrandall to the inn and subsequently disappeared, is suspected. Mrs. Wrandall starts back for New York in an auto during a blinding snow storm. On the way she meets a young woman in the road who proves to be the woman who killed Wrandall. Feeling that the girl had done her a service in ridding her of the man who though she loved him deeply, had caused her great sorrow. Mrs. Wrandall determines to shield her and takes her to her own home. Mrs. Wrandall hears the story of Hetty Castleton's life, except that portion that relates to Wrandall. This and the story of the tragedy she forbids the girl ever to tell. She offers Hetty a home, friendship and security from peril on account of the tragedy. Mrs. Sara Wrandall and Hetty attend the funeral of Challis Wrandall at the home of his parents. Sara Wrandall and Hetty return to New York after an absence of a year in Europe. Leslie Wrandall, brother of Challis, makes himself useful to Sara and becomes greatly interested in Hetty. Sara sees in Leslie's infatuation possibility for revenge on the Wrandalls and reparation for the wrongs she suffered at the hands of Challis Wrandall by marrying his murderess into the family. Leslie, in company with his friend Brandon Booth, an artist, visits Sara at her country place. Leslie confesses to Sara that he is madly in love with Hetty. Sara arranges with Booth to paint a picture of Hetty. Booth has a haunting feeling that he has seen Hetty before. Looking through a portfolio of pictures by an unknown English artist he finds one of Hetty. He speaks to her about it. Hetty declares it must be a picture of Hetty Glynn, an English actress, who resembles her very much. Leslie Wrandall becomes impatient and jealous over the picture painting and declares he is going to propose to Hetty at the first opportunity. Much to his chagrin Leslie is refused by Hetty. Sara, between whom and Hetty a strong mutual affection has grown up, tries to persuade the girl that she should not let the tragedy prevent her from marrying.

CHAPTER XI.—Continued.

"You do know it, don't you?" he went on.

"I—God knows I don't want you to love me. I never meant that you should—" she was saying, as if to herself.

"I suppose it's hopeless," he said dumbly, as her voice trailed off in a whisper.

"Yes, it is utterly hopeless," she said, and she was white to the lips.

"I—I sha'n't say anything more," said he. "Of course, I understand how it is. There's some one else, Only I want you to know that I love you with all my soul, Hetty. I—I don't see how I'm going to get on without you. But I—I won't distress you, dear."

"There isn't anyone else, Brandon," she said in a very low voice. Her fingers tightened on his in a sort of desperation. "I know what you are thinking. It isn't Leslie. It never can be Leslie."

"Then—then—" he stammered, the blood surging back into his heart—"there may be a chance—"

"No, no!" she cried, almost vehemently. "I can't let you go on hoping. It is wrong—so terribly wrong. You must forget me. You must—"

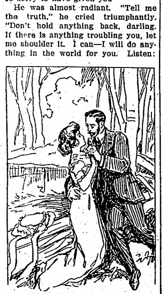
He seized her other hand and held them both firmly, masterfully.

"See here, my—look at me, dearest! What is wrong? Tell me! You are unhappy. Don't be afraid to tell me. You—you do love me?"

She drew a long breath through her half-closed lips. Her eyes darkened with pain.

"No. I don't love you. Oh, I am so sorry to have given you—"

He was almost radiant. "Tell me the truth," he cried triumphantly. "Don't hold anything back, darling. If there is anything troubling you, let me shoulder it. I can—I will do anything in the world for you. Listen: I know there's a mystery somewhere. I have felt it about you always. I have seen it in your eyes, I have always sensed it stealing over me when I'm with you—this strange, bewildering atmosphere of—"



"Some Day You Will Tell Me—Everything?"

"Hush! You must not say anything more," she cried out. "I cannot love you. There is nothing more to be said."

"But I know it now. You do love me. I could shout it to—" The miserable, whipped expression in her eyes checked this outburst. He was struck by it, even dismayed. "My dearest one, my love," he said, with infinite tenderness, "what is it? Tell me?"

He drew her to him. His arm went about her shoulders. The final thrill of ecstasy bounded through his veins. The feel of her! The wonderful, subtle, feminine feel of her! His brain reeled in a new and vast whirl of intoxication.

She sat there very still and unresisting, her hand to her lips, uttering no word, scarcely breathing. He waited. He gave her time. After a little while her fingers strayed to the crown of her limp, rakish panama. They found the single hatpin and drew it out. He smiled as he pushed the hat away and then pressed her dark little head against his breast. Her blue eyes were swimming.

"Just this once, just this once," she murmured with a sob in her voice. Her hand stole upward and caressed his brown cheek and throat. Tears of joy started in his eyes—tears of exquisite delight.

"Good God, Hetty, I—I can't do without you,' he whispered, shaken by his passion. "Nothing can come between us. I must have you always like this."

"Che sara, sara," she sighed, like the breath of the summer wind as it sings in the trees.

The minutes passed and neither spoke. His rapt gaze hung upon the glossy crown that pressed against him so gently. He could not see her eyes, but somehow he felt they were tightly shut, as if in pain.

"I love you, Hetty. Nothing can matter," he whispered at last. "Tell me what it is."

She lifted her head and gently withdrew herself from his embrace. He did not oppose her, noting the serious, almost somber look in her eyes as she turned to regard him steadfastly, an unwavering integrity of purpose in their depths.

She had made up her mind to tell him a part of the truth. "Brandon, I am Hetty Glynn."

He started, not so much in surprise as at the abruptness with which she made the announcement.

"I have been sure of it, dear, from the beginning," he said quietly.

Then her tongue was loosed. The words rushed to her lips. "I was Hawkright's model for six months. I posed for all those studies, and for the big canvas in the academy. It was either that or starvation. Oh, you will hate me—you must hate me."

He laid his hand on her hair, a calm smile on his lips. "I can't love and hate at the same time," he said. "There was nothing wrong in what you did for Hawkright. I am a painter, you know. I understand. Does—does Mrs. Wrandall know all this?"

"Yes—everything. She knows and understands. She is an angel, Brandon, an angel from heaven. But," she burst forth, "I am not altogether a sham. I am the daughter of Colonel Castleton, and I am cousin of all the Murgatroyds—the poor relation. It isn't as if I were the scum of the earth, is it? I am a Castleton. My father comes of a noble family. And, Brandon, the only thing I've ever done in my life that I am really ashamed of is the deception I practiced on you when you brought that magazine to me and faced me with it. I did not lie to you. I simply let you believe I was not the—the person you thought I was. But I deceived you—"

"No, you did not deceive me," he said gently. "I read the truth in your dear eyes."

"There are other things, too. I shall not speak of them, except to repeat that I have not done anything else in my life that I should be ashamed of." Her eyes were burning with earnestness. He could not but understand what she meant.

Again he stroked her hair. "I am sure of that," he said.

"My mother was Kitty Glynn, the actress. My father, a younger son, fell in love with her. They were married against the wishes of his father, who cut him off. He was in the service, and he was brave enough to stick. They went to one of the South African garrisons, and I was born there. Then to India. Then back to London, where an aunt had died, leaving my father quite a comfortable fortune. But his old friends would have nothing to do with him. He had lived—well, he had made life a hell for my mother in those frontier posts. He deserted us in the end, after he had squandered the fortune. My mother made no effort to compel him to provide for her or for me. She was proud. She was hurt. Today he is in India, still in the service, a martinet with a record for bravery on the field of battle that cannot be taken from him, no matter what else may befall. I hear from him once or twice a year. That is all I can tell you about him. My mother died three years ago, after two years of invalidism. During those years I tried to repay her for the sacrifice she had made in giving me the education, the—" She choked up for a second, and then went bravely on. "Her old manager made a place for me in one of his companies. I took my mother's name, Hetty Glynn, and—well, for a season and a half I was in the chorus. I could not stay there. I could not," she repeated with a shudder. "I gave it up after my mother's death. I was fairly well equipped for work as a children's governess, so I engaged myself to—"

She stopped in dismay, for he was laughing.

"And now do you know what I think of you, Miss Hetty Glynn?" he cried, seizing her hands and regarding her with a serious, steadfast gleam in his eyes. "You are the pluckiest, sandiest girl I've ever known. You are the kind that heroines are made of. There is nothing in what you've told me that could in the least alter my regard for you, except to increase the love I thought could be no stronger. Will you marry me, Hetty?"

She jerked her hands away, and held them clenched against her breast.

"No! I cannot. It is impossible, Brandon. If I loved you less than I do, I might say yes, but—no, it is impossible."

His eyes narrowed. A gray shadow crept over his face.

"There can be only one obstacle so serious as all that," he said slowly. "You—you are already married."

"No!' she cried, lifting her pathetic eyes to his. "It isn't that. Oh, please be good to me! Don't ask me to say anything more. Don't make it hard for me, Brandon. I love you—I love you. To be your wife would be the most glorious—No, no! I must not even think of it. I must put it out of my mind. There is a barrier, dearest. We cannot surmount it. Don't ask me to tell you, for I cannot. I—I am so happy in knowing that you love me, and that you still love me after I have told you how mean and shameless I was in deceiving—"

He drew her close and kissed her full on the trembling lips. She gasped and closed her eyes, lying like one in a swoon. Soft, moaning sounds came from her lips. He could not help feeling a vast pity for her, she was so gentle, so miserably hurt by something he could not understand, but knew to be monumental in its power to oppress.

"Listen, dearest," he said, after a long silence; "I understand this much, at least: you can't talk about it now. Whatever it is, it hurts, and God knows I don't want to make it worse for you in this hour when I am so selfishly happy. Time will show us the way. It can't be insurmountable. Love always triumphs. I only ask you to repeat those three little words, and I will be content. Say them."

"I love you," she murmured.

"There! You are mine! Three little words bind you to me forever. I will wait until the barrier is down. Then I will take you."

"The barrier grows stronger every day," she said, staring out beyond the tree-tops at the scudding clouds. "It never can be removed.'

"Some day you will tell me—everything?"

She hesitated long. "Yes, before God, Brandon, I will tell you. Not now, but—some day. Then you will see why—why I cannot—" She could not complete the sentence.

"I don't believe there is anything you can tell me that will alter my feelings toward you," he said firmly. "The barrier may be insurmountable, but my love is everlasting."

"I can only thank you, dear, and—love you with all my wretched heart."

"You are not pledged to some one else?"

"No."

"That's all I want to know," he said, with a deep breath. "I thought it might be—Leslie."

"No, no!" she cried out, and he caught a note of horror in her voice.

"Does he know this — this thing you can't tell me?" he demanded, a harsh note of jealousy in his voice.

She looked at him, hurt by his tone. "Sara knows," she said. "There is no one else. But you are not to question her. I demand it of you."

"I will wait for you to tell me," he said gently.

CHAPTER XII.

Sara Wrandall Finds the Truth.

Sara had kept the three Wrandalls over for luncheon.

"My dear," said Mrs. Redmond Wrandall, as she stood before Hetty's portrait at the end of the long living-room, "I must say that Brandon has succeeded in catching that lovely little something that makes her so—what shall I say?—so mysterious? Is that what I want? The word is as elusive as the expression."

"Subtle is the word you want, mother," said Vivian, standing beside Leslie, tall, slim and aristocratic, her hands behind her back, her manner one of absolute indifference. Vivian was more than handsome; she was striking.

"There isn't anything subtle about Hetty," said Sara, with a laugh. "She's quite ingenuous."

Leslie was pulling at his mustache, and frowning slightly. The sunburn on his nose and forehead had begun to peel off in chappy little flakes.

"Ripping likeness, though," was his comment.

"Oh, perfect," said his mother. "Really wonderful. It will make Brandon famous."

"She's so healthy-looking," said Vivian.

"English," remarked Leslie, as if that covered everything.

"Nonsense," cried the elder Mrs. Wrandall, lifting her lorgnette again. "Pure, honest, unmixed blood, that's what it is. There is birth in that girl's face."

"You're always talking about birth, mother," said her son sourly, as he turned away.

"It's a good thing to have," said his mother with conviction.

"It's an easy thing to get in America," said he, pulling out his cigarette case.

It was then that Sara prevailed upon them to stop for luncheon. "Hetty always takes these long walks in the morning, and she will be disappointed if she finds you haven't waited—"

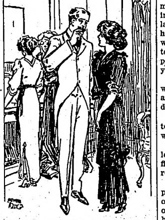
"Oh, as for that—" began Leslie and stopped, but he could not have been more lucid if he had uttered the sentence in full.

"Why didn't you pick her up and bring her home with you?" asked Sara, as they moved off in the direction of the porch.

"She seemed to be taking Brandy out for his morning exercise," said he surlily. "Far be it from me to—Umph!"

Sara repressed the start of surprise. She thought Hetty was alone.

"She will bring him in for luncheon, I suppose," she said carelessly, although there was a slight contraction of the eyelids. "He is a privileged character."



"She Doesn't Seem Especially Overjoyed to See Me."

It was long past the luncheon hour when Hetty came in, flushed and warm. She was alone, and she had been walking rapidly.

"Oh, I'm sorry to be so late," she apologized, darting a look of anxiety at Sara. "We grew careless with time. Am I shockingly late?"

She was shaking hands with Mrs. Redmond Wrandall as she spoke. Leslie and Vivian stood by, rigidly awaiting their turn. Neither appeared to be especially cordial.

"What is the passing of an hour, my dear," said the old lady, "to one who is young and can spare it?"

"I did not expect you—I mean to say, nothing was said about luncheon, was there, Sara?" She was in a pretty state of confusion.

"No," said Leslie, breaking in; "we butted in, that's all. How are you?" He clasped her hand and bent over it. She was regarding him with slightly dilated eyes. He misinterpreted the steady scrutiny. "Oh, it will all peel off in a day or two," he explained, going a shade redder.

"When did you return?" she asked. "I thought tomorrow was—"

"Leslie never has any tomorrows, Miss Castleton," explained Vivian. "He always does tomorrow's work today. That's why he never has any troubles ahead of him."

"What rot!" exclaimed Leslie.

"Where is Mr. Booth?" inquired Sara. "Wouldn't he come in, Hetty?"

"I—I didn't think to ask him to stop for luncheon,' she replied, and then hurried off to her room to make herself presentable.

Hetty was in a state of nervous excitement during the luncheon. The encounter with Booth had not resulted at all as she had fancied it would. She had betrayed herself in a most disconcerting manner, and now was more deeply involved than ever before. She had been determined at the outset, she had failed, and now he had a claim—an incontestable claim against her. She found it difficult to meet Sara's steady, questioning gaze. She wanted to be alone.

After luncheon, Leslie drew Sara aside.

"I must say she doesn't seem especially overjoyed to see me," he growled. "She's as cool as ice."

"What do you expect, Leslie?" she demanded with some asperity.

"I can't stand this much longer, Sara," he said. "Don't you see how things are going? She's losing her heart to Booth."

"I don't see how we can prevent it."

"By gad, I'll have another try at it—tonight. I say, has she said—anything?"

"She pities you," she said, a malicious joy in her soul. "That's akin to something else, you know."

"Confound it all, I don't want to be pitied!"

"Then I'd advise you to defer your 'try' at it," she remarked.

"I'm mad about her, Sara. I can't sleep, I can't think, I can't—yes, I can eat, but it doesn't taste right to me. I've just got to have it settled. Why, people are beginning to notice the change in me. They say all sorts of things. About my liver, and all that sort of thing. I'm going to settle it tonight. It's been nearly three weeks now. She's surely had time to think it over; how much better everything will be for her, and all that. She's no fool, Sara. And do you know what Vivian's doing this very instant over there in the corner? She's inviting her to spend a fortnight over at our place. If she comes—well, that means the engagement will be announced at once."

Sara did not marvel at his assurance in the face of what had gone before. She knew him too well. In spite of the original rebuff, he was thoroughly satisfied in his own mind that Hetty Castleton would not be such a fool as to refuse him the second time.

"It is barely possible, Leslie," she said, "that she may consider Brandon Booth quite as good a catch as you, and infinitely better looking at the present moment."

"It's this beastly sunburn," he lamented, rubbing his nose gently, thinking first of his person. An instant later he was thinking of the other half of the declaration. "That's just what I've been afraid of," he said. "I told you what would happen if that portrait nonsense went on forever. It's your fault, Sara."

"But I have reason to believe she will not accept him, if it goes so far as that. You are quite safe in that direction."

"Gad, I'd hate to risk it," he muttered. "I have a feeling she's in love with him."

Vivian approached. "Sara, you must let me have Miss Castleton for the first two weeks in July," she said serenely.

"I can't do it, Vivian," said the other promptly. "I can't bear the thought of being alone in this big old barn of a place. Nice of you to want her, but—"

"Oh, don't be selfish, Sara," cried Vivian.

"You don't know how much I depend on her," said Sara.

"I'd ask you over, too, dear, if there weren't so many others coming. I don't know where we're going to put them. You understand, don't you?"

"Perfectly," said her sister-in-law.

"But I've been counting on—Hetty."

"I say, Sara," broke in Leslie, "you could go up to Bar Harbor with the Williamsons at that time. Tell her about the invitation, Vivie."

"It isn't necessary," said Sara coldly. "I scarcely know the Williamsons." She hesitated an instant and then went on with sardonic dismay: "They're in trade, you know."

"That's nothing against 'em," protested he. "Awfully jolly people—really ripping. Ain't they, Viv?"

"I don't know them well enough to say," said Vivian, turning away. "I only know we're all snobs of the worst sort."

"Just a minute, Viv," he called out. "What does Miss Castleton say about coming?" It was an eager question. Much depended on the reply.

"I haven't asked her," said his sister succinctly. "How could I, without first consulting Sara?"

"Then you don't intend to ask her?"

"Certainly not."

After the Wrandalls had departed, Sara took Hetty off to her room. The girl knew what was coming.

"Hetty," said the older woman, facing her after she had closed the door of her boudoir, "what is going on between you and Brandon Booth? I must have the truth. Are you doing anything foolish?"

"Foolish? Heaven help me, no! It—it is a tragedy," cried Hetty, meeting her gaze with one of utter despair.

"What has happened? Tell me!"

"What am I to do, Sara darling? He—he has told me that he—he—"

"Loves you?"

"Yes."

"And you have told him that his love is returned?"

"I couldn't help it. I was carried away. I did not mean to let him see that I—"

"You are such a novice in the business of love," said Sara sneeringly. "You are in the habit of being carried away, I fear."

"Oh, Sara!"

"You must put a stop to all this at once. How can you think of marrying him, Hetty Glynn? Send him—"

"I do not intend to marry him," said the girl, suddenly calm and dignified.

"I am to draw but one conclusion, I suppose," said the other, regarding the girl intently.

"What do you mean?"

"Is it necessary to ask that question?"

The puzzled expression remained in the girl's eyes for a time, and then slowly gave way to one of absolute horror.

"How dare you suggest such a thing?" she cried, turning pale, then crimson. "How dare you?"

Sara laughed shortly. "Isn't the inference a natural one? You are forgetting yourself."

"I understand," said the girl, through pallid lips. Her eyes were dark with pain and misery. "You think I am altogether bad." She drooped perceptibly.

"You went to Burton's inn," sententiously.

"But, Sara, you must believe me. I did not know he was—married. For God's sake, do me the justice to—"

"But you went there with him," insisted the other, her eyes hard as steel. "It doesn't matter whether he was married—or free. You went."

Hetty threw herself upon her companion's breast and wound her strong arms about her.

"Sara, Sara, you must let me explain—you must let me tell you everything. Don't stop me! You have refused to hear my plea—"

"And I still refuse;" cried Sara, throwing her off angrily. "Good God, do you think I will listen to you? If you utter another word, I will—strangle you!"

Hetty shrank back, terrified. Slowly she moved backward in the direction of the door, never taking her eyes from the impassioned face of her protector.

"Don't, Sara, please don't!" she begged. "Don't look at me like that! I promise—I promise. Forgive me! I would not give you an instant's pain for all the world. You would suffer, you would—"

Sara suddenly put her hands over her eyes. A single moan escaped her lips—a hoarse gasp of pain.

"Dearest!" cried Hetty, springing to her side.

Sara threw her head up and met her with a cold, repelling look.

"Wait!" she commanded. "The time has come when you should know what is in my mind, and has been for months. It concerns you. I expect you to marry Leslie Wrandall."

Hetty stopped short.

"How can you jest with me, Sara?" she cried, suddenly indignant.

"I am not jesting," said Sara levelly.

"You—you—really mean—what you have just said?" The puzzled look gave way to one of revulsion. A great shudder swept over her.

"Leslie Wrandall must pay his brother's debt to you."

"My God!" fell from the girl's stiff lips. "You—you must be going mad—mad!"

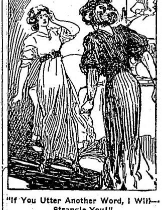
Sara laughed softly. "I have meant it almost from the beginning," she said. "It came to my mind the day that Challis was buried. It has never been out of it for an instant since that day. Now you understand."

If she expected Hetty to fall into a fit of weeping, to collapse, to plead with her for mercy, she was soon to find herself mistaken. The girl straightened up suddenly and met her gaze with one in which there was the fierce determination. Her eyes were steady, her bosom heaved.

"And I have loved you so devotedly—so blindly," she said, in low tones of scorn. "You have been hating me all these months while I thought you were loving me. What a fool I have been! I might have known. You couldn't love me."

"When Leslie asks you tonight to marry him, you are to say that you will do so," said Sara, betraying no sign of having heard the bitter words.

"I shall refuse, Sara," said Hetty, every vestige of color gone from her face.



"If You Utter Another Word, I Will—Strangle You!"

"There is an alternative," announced the other deliberately.

"You will expose me to—him? To his family?"

"I shall turn you over to them, to let them do what they will with you. If you go as his wife, the secret is safe. If not, they may have you as you really are, to destroy, to annihilate. Take your choice, my dear."

"And you, Sara?" asked the girl quietly. "What explanation will you have to offer for all these months of protection?"

Her companion stared. "Has the prospect no terror for you?"

THE SUNBEAM.

BY W. G. HUNT.

Published every Friday, at Sunbeam, Pennington County, Minnesota.

Entered as Second-class matter August 30 1905, at the post office at Sunbeam Minn. under the Act of Congress of March 3.1879

Le Sueur News: Stand back of the president! Why not? He is not only president, but a remarkable one as well. He is not partisan, he is not a weakling, he is not a fanatic. He is a man, giving his manhood, his best efforts and his life's work to the people of the United States. He is simple and honest. Stand back of him. Why, of course. The man who refuses to do so is not a good citizen. We should be thankful that we have him, the firm, simple and sincere man, with his strong hand on the helm in this hour of danger. He will not falter. If he makes a mistake it will not be from the heart.

We publish this week the announcement of Congressman Steenerson who is again to be a candidate for re-election. THE SUNBEAM has been a steadfast supporter of the able representative from this district since he first became a candidate for the Republican nomination, and we are proud of his record, as he has represented the people in the able manner that we told them he would, when he first became a candidate, and we can go into this campaign for his return for two years more without offering any apology for doing so, as he has certainly filled the bill.

MEDIATION PROGRESS.

The mediation of so complex and touchy an affair as the Mexican situation is a delicate task, and it will not be ended until it is over with. When a thing that seems like a trifle may at any time overthrow all the work that has been carefully done, jubilation will be premature until the work is completed and accepted on all sides.

But, in the meantime, it is fair to say that thus far the success that has attended the deliberations of the mediators has surprised everybody. It has confounded the critics of the mediation plan, who were few and foolish, being blinded by Bull Moose or G. O. P. partisanship.

When mediation was arranged, The Herald said that it was a splendid thing even if no direct good came of it, because it would go far to adjust on a kindlier basis our relationships with Latin-America.

Now it looks not only possible but probable that not this good alone, but the good of permanent peace in Mexico, may come out of it.—The Duluth Herald.

Bro. Jones of the Bagley Herald takes us to task for our article published of the Representative candidates in our issue of May 22nd, and says that it is worth $5.00 a line to Duffy, if the farmers would swallow the dope. We wish to say to Mr. Jones that we are a farmer ourselves, that is tilling the soil, and we are also the owner and publisher of THE SUNBEAM, and we always reserve the right to express our opinion in our editorial columns.

There are two opponents of J. W. LaBree for the nomination for sheriff, one of them is an entire stranger to us, and the other one Lewis Nelson is not as well qualified for the position as LaBree, of which fact people who have done business through that office are well aware. The only excuse that they can give for defeating LaBree is that another man wants the job, but we think the people will retain him in his present position for another term.

We understand that one of the candidates for office who is posing as a farmer puts in his time sitting on cracker boxes at Thief River Falls, farming the farmers.

One of the candidates for county office wrote us a personal letter this week, asking us to vote for him, but as he did not ask our subscribers through our columns for their votes, we guess we won't vote for him either.

If nominated and elected I pledge to use my best efforts and ability, to work for the following legislation.

Legislation for economy and efficiency in the state Administration of business affairs, for the purpose of lightening the burden of the present high taxes.

Legislation for increasing the efficiency of our present Road Law, known as the "Dunn Good Road Law."

Legislation that will prevent discrimination in the enforcement of our tax levies.

Also I will favor legislation giving both sexes an equal franchise.

I shall encourage the adoption of the Revolving Fund Amendment, known as House File No. 1242. Also the Initative Referendum Amendment.

Realizing thet the people in the Sixty Fifth Dist. are dependent upon the Agricultural products of the soil, and her wealth must come there from, I shall favor all legislation that will tend to benefit rural communities especially the farmers and laborers.

I am opposed to "Boss" rule, Boss rulers, are political "Yeggmen," robbing the voters our of their inherent rights of a free ballot debarring them rom a free choice of their Legislators; —therefore, I favor our present Non-Partisan Primary Law and will support all legislation that will tend to make our primary law more efficient. I am opposed to the centralization of the power of Government but firmly believe in the rule of the people in governing all their local and domestic affairs.

If nominated and elected I shall support every measure that will tend to increase the power of the people in local and state government and all measures that will tend to build up the social conditions of our rural communities.

PUT RIVER ON MAP

COLONEL ROOSEVELT GIVES GRAPHIC STORY OF PERILS IN WILDS OF BRAZIL.

ALL THE MAPS ARE WRONG

Reasserts His Claims to Discovery of River Duvida in Address Before National Geographic Society—River Is as Long as the Elbe.

Washington, May 27. — Theodore Roosevelt last night gave an extended account of his discovery of the Duvida river, or river of doubt, before the National Geographic society in this city. He declared that the river is as long as the Elbe and is not shown on any map. As a result of his explorations, Colonel Roosevelt declared that all of the maps of the country he traversed are wrong.

Mr. Roosevelt's address was in part as follows:

"Hardly ever can you do anything of note, except by building on what has been done by your predecessors' work. Columbus could not have discovered America, if it had not been for the deeds of Portuguese and to a less extent of Spanish sailors, from the days of Prince Henry the Navigator on. Peary could not have discovered the North pole if there had not been for generations men who had been pushing far northward the limits of knowledge of the polar regions.

"To take an infinitely less important instance, I could have done nothing in South America if it had not been for the work done by scores of other men during the years that passed, and especially during the last seven or eight years.

* * *

"Here is the Amazon river. It was descended and discovered for the first time nearly four centuries ago by the early Spanish explorers, whose feats were so phenomenal that they make all the work of all of us who have anything on that river today seem child's play in comparison. I say that, meaning it literally.

"The people who went up and down the Amazon speedily discovered the mouths of a number of rivers. One, two and three centuries elapsed befor they discovered anything about those rivers except the mouths, and in the case of the river of which I am going to speak what they did say about the mouth was entirely wrong.

"I did not go down to South America with any intention of making such an exploration as this.

* * *

"When I go off on a trip I do not like to make pictures for myself of what I am going to do, because I do not know, but I had supposed that our trip would chiefly be a zoological trip, and I went primarily for the American Museum of Natural History with that end in view.

"When I got to Rio Janeiro, Mr. Lauro Mueller, who visited us last year, and who is the minister of foreign affairs of Brazil, told me that, of course, they would help me to do what I wished, which was to go up the Paraguay and then down into the Amazon, but that he thought he had something which would appeal to me much more: that the telegraphic commission which had been working in the western portion of Brazil had found that the best existing maps were totally wrong, that the whole region would have to be remapped after the discoveries of the telegraphic commission, and that they had found the sources of two rivers running north, which went they did not know where.

"One of those rivers, the smaller, was called the Pineapple. The other, and larger one, was caller the Duvida, the River of Doubt, because they did not know where it went out. He told me that the head of the telegraphic commission, Colonel Rondon, who had for 25 years been engaged in the work of exploring that wild western wilderness of Brazil, would, if I desired, accompany me, down that river and see where it came out, and he said:

"'Now, we will be delighted to have you do it, but, of course, you must understand, we cannot tell you anything of what will happen, and there will be some surprises not necessarily pleasant.' I said, 'Well, by George, that is just what I would like to do—to make the try and see what would happen down that river.'

* * *

"And now here I want, with all th emphasis possible—and I wish that the Brazilian ambassador were here to report to his government what I say—I want with all the emphasis possible to attest that everything that we did this year was a sequel to and was conditioned upon what the telegraphic commission of Brazil, under Colonel Rondon and his associates, had done during the preceding seven years.

"We would not have known the existence of the headwaters of this river. We could not have crossed the highland wilderness at all if it had not been for the work of that commission. All that we did was to put the cap on the pyramid of which they had laid deep and broad the foundations.

"I greatly wish that this body would pay some recognition—would give some recognition—to the really remarkable work that has been done by Colonel Rondon and his associates of the Brazilian telegraphic commission during the last seven years—work which, from the geographic standpoint, and from the standpoint of the development of the natural resources of the nation, is as noteworthy as anything that has been accomplished during the same length of time anywhere in the world.

"They have not had too much recognition in their own country. A prophet is not without honor, you know, save in his own country. They have had practically no recognition abroad.

"We started up the Paraguay and then struck across country on mule back to this point and then went down to there. It is almost impossible for me to show you on these standard maps what I did, because the maps are so preposterously wrong. For instance, there are two rivers close together, the Sacare and the Tapajos—that is within ten miles of each other—each of which has a waterfall about the size of the falls of the Yellowstone, in one case about 150 feet high and in the other case about 250 feet high, of which we took numerous photographs. There is not a hint of the existence of those waterfalls, nor, as far as I can find, of those rivers on that map.

"We then journeyed three weeks further on and came down to this point here (indicating on the map). There, on the map, is a mountain. There was really a valley with a river flowing down the middle. It does nothing of the kind. It does not run anywhere near it. Here are those rivers heading up there. They do not head up there.

"We went down another river where their sources are supposed to be, and these mountains are almost as irrelevant to the facts as are the rivers themselves. You can see, as I said, better on this map here. Here is the Tapajos. Here is the G. Parana running into the Madeira.

* * *

"On that map and on this you will find a little river in about 5½ degrees. I think the actual course is about 5.12 or 5.15, but very nearly 5½, a little river there put on there and put down here dotted without any name. I want you to look at this map. This is Bartholomew's map of South America. I want you to be able to check off for yourselves exactly the statement that I make.

"We found that this river, called the Dubitas (river of darkness) arose between the fifty-ninth and sixtieth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, just north of the thirteenth degree of latitude south. It first flowed west and then south, and then flowed north, originally as a mountainous, timber choked brook, not navigable until in latitude 12 degrees 1 minute south and longitude 60 degrees and 18 minutes west about in each case; maybe two or three minutes wrong.

* * *

"We crossed the telegraph line at a point where it becomes navigable, and it was there that we embarked, and we then ran on down about five degrees. I will put it in here. I do not know whether those in the rear of the hall can see it, but I have put it there now, that river as we have put it on the map. I want to call your attention to the fact that I am using my terms with scientific precision, and when I say 'put it on the map' I mean what I say. I mean that it is not on any map, and that we have put it on the map.

"The different portions of the course that we followed varied widely in difficulty. We first of all ran four days surveying of the river very accurately, and therefore going very slowly without encountering any rapids or other obstacles.

* * *

"I went down that river, going down there for the first time and of course endeavoring to map it in detail.

"It is much easier now for anyone to follow us, and if this geographic society or any other responsible organization wishes to send a man to or down that river I will give him letters of introduction and advice which will enable him, with comparatively little difficulty, to go over the entire course of that river and report on all the features in detail which, of course, the first explorers necessarily sketched in outline.

"I will give him letters to a rubber man who will unquestionably assist to get the canoes and the rowers that will enable him to ascend as far as the lowest of the uppermost rapids and come back, covering two-thirds of the distance and going up to the tenth degree.

"And this river, of about the size of the Elbe or the Rhine, through a region which on the maps issued today, the best maps, is not shown at all, is itself not shown on any map. Anybody can go up there and see for himself what has been done and can go through the work in detail, as I cannot go through it, and as we could not when we made our exploration through it.

"Now, when we embarked, having gone some 30 days by mule and ox train across this high central plateau of western Brazil, our party consisted of 22 men. We said good-by to Mr. Mueller and his associates here on the 27th of February.

"Exactly 60 days afterward, which consisted of canoeing work, we met Lieutenant Perrirez and the little steamboat which he had at that point. On the trip, of our six members, Mr. Cherrie, my son, the doctor, and Lieutenant Lira kept diaries day to day. Colonel Rondon kept the record in the order of the days. I kept the record in the writing that I had to do.

"I will come later to tell you what part of it had never been traversed by any civilized man before and what part of it had already been known to the rubber gatherers, but absolutely unknown to any map maker; to these map makers here that I have quoted to you—English, Germa.., French, American, or Brazilian—none of them know anything about it at all.

"For four days we ran, as I say, rather slowly before encountering any rapids. We then struck our first serious rapids. After that, which was in about 11 degrees 45 minutes south, we spent 42 days during which we slept every day at the head or foot of a rapids, and during the 42 days we only covered one degree of latitude, going to about 10 degrees 45 minutes south; that is, from 11 degrees 45 minutes to 10 degrees 45 minutes, and therefore making not much more than a mile and a half a day in a straight line, the curves of the river adding greatly to the distance actually traveled.

* * *

"We had by that time gone not more than a sixth of the distance that we expected to go and had used up about three-fourths or four-fifths of our food. We had been on half rations pretty much all the time, eked out with parrots and monkeys, which we enjoyed there. But I can assure any of my zoological friends that they can leave me with entire safety in the monkey house without my making any assault on any of the inmates. I have had all the monkey I wish.

"Then, during that time, of the seven canoes and seven dugouts with which we started we lost five canoes on the rapids. We built three others and lost one of those. One man was drowned in the rapids. There were several other narrow escapes from drowning, and under the strain, which was great, one of the men went completely mad and murdered another and himself fled into the wilderness.

"Then we came out of the last succession of rapids, having been gone 46 days. It might have been 42 or 43 days, and either 46 or 47 days, and all of our troubles were over.

* * *

"We struck a long stretch of smooth water. The river was broad and big in that part, and after two days more we struck the uppermost camp or house of any of the rubber men. We were able to get food—sugar cane, manioca, sometimes rice or bananas, occasionaly a chicken or a duck, not very often. And in the 11 days, if I remember rightly, we got eight eggs, which divided among the six of us would have given each man one egg a week.

"Until men have had experience they can hardly realize the insufferable difference there is going down a stream broken by rapids which are unknown and going down a stream just as difficult which is known.

"In the first place you come to the head of the rapids and you have not any idea what is ahead. You have to land and send people forward to explore.

"They may have to be gone three or four hours. They come back. They may have only explored one side of the stream. If they find it very bad they may have to cross over and explore for three or four hours on the other side, down, to see if there is not some channel on that side on which you can get your canoe. Then you have to come back and report as to whether you can run the canoes loaded.

"Our canoes were so overladen that we could not often do that. It is a question whether you can run them down empty and merely portage the goods, or whether you must portage the goods and let the canoes down by ropes, or whether you will have to do as we had to do on three or four occasions—cut roads through the woods, lay down logs, and with block and tackle and by the severest kind of bodily labor drag the heavy, clumsy dugouts overland down to the foot of the rapids.

"If you are overcautious you will take so long a time that you will exhaust your food supply and be in danger of starvation. If you are overrisky you may lose the canoes and what's in them. Then you face starvation, not in the future, but in the present.

"The medicines are almost as important as the food. We had to keep the men and ourselves all dosed with quinine the whole time in order to keep the fever from us. I think everybody got the fever more or less, but if we had not had the quinine we would have been laid out.

"We were fortunate enough on our trip down the river not to lose any of our instruments or any of the specimens or notebooks or anything else that was of consequence to the expedition, but we had to cut all our personal belongings to the bone.

* * *

"On the upper course of the river there were Indians. They were afraid of us and somewhat hostile. I think their hostility was due only to timidity, but if you are shot by a man because he is afraid of you it is almost as unpleasant as if he shot you because he disliked you.

"In the wilderness people portray you as being in danger from crocodiles and jaguars and so on. They are not the things you mind. It is the mosquitoes and the poisonous ants. It is the ants that eat up your clothing. It is the moribund wasps that are perfectly awful. It is these so-called borochuda and plum flies, which are like the black flies of the northern woods, only worse, and it is the insect pests of that kind that are really serious drawbacks to work in the wilderness. The life lacked a good deal of being undiluted pleasure during the time we spent at that camp. We were about three days, almost four days, in the camp."

Belgian King a Great Smoker.

King Albert of Belgium, who is an ardent lover of tobacco, is an honorary member of a dozen different Belgian pipe smokers' clubs.

Next month a great pipe-smoking tournament will open simultaneously in Brussels, at Antwerp, at Ghent and at Liege. Prizes, including a magnificent meerschaum pipe, offered by the king, will be competed for, the winners being those who smoke the greatest number of pipes in a given time.

Participation in the contest is subject to one condition—that the tobacco smoked shall be of purely Belgian origin. It must have been grown either in Belgium proper or in the Belgian Congo.

SCALP ITCHED AND BURNED

833 South Scioto St., Circleville, Ohio.—"My little girl's trouble first started on her head in a bunch of little pimples full of yellow-looking matter and they would spread in large places. In a short time they would open. Her scalp was awfully red and inflamed and the burning and itching were so intense that she would scratch and rub till it would leave ugly sores. The sores also appeared on her body, and her clothing irritated them so that I had to put real soft cloth next to her body. She would lie awake of nights and was very worrisome. At times she was tortured with itching and burning.

"I tried different remedies with no benefit for months. I had given up all hope of her ever getting rid of it, then I concluded to try Cuticura Soap and Ointment. The second application gave relief. In a short time she was entirely cured." (Signed) Mrs. Alice Kirlin, Nov. 4, 1912.

Smooth-Faced Wisdom.

President Wilson is the first "barefaced" occupant of the White House since President McKinley. Indeed, these have been the only smooth-faced presidents since the Civil war. The faces of the most conspicuous members of the cabinet are whiskerless, as is the mobile countenance of the speaker of the house. The sensible fashion is especially noticeable in the medical profession, owing to the fact that formerly its members regarded whiskers as an indispensable part of their equipment, on a par with the stethoscope and clinical thermometer and odor of carbolic acid. The idea then was, of course, to look old. Now they try to appear young. Other business and professional men are following the example of the doctors, much to the gratification of the barbers and razor manufacturers. It is not likely that we shall soon again see the day when whiskers cover a multitude of chins.

The New Cook.

Senator John Sharp Williams, arguing against suffrage at a tea in Washington, said, with a smile:

"These feminists know less about the nature of woman than the new cook knew about cooking.

"'Martha,' said the mistress to the new cook, 'I thought I told you we'd have curried chicken for dinner.'

"'Yes'm,' the new cook answered, 'but the hostler was busy and I ain't no hand with a currycomb.'"

HER MOTHER-IN-LAW

Proved a Wise, Good Friend.

A young woman out in Ia. found a wise, good friend in her mother-in-law, jokes notwithstanding. She writes:

"I was greatly troubled with my stomach, complexion was blotchy and yellow. After meals I often suffered sharp pains and would have to lie down. My mother often told me it was the coffee I drank at meals. But when I'd quit coffee I'd have a severe headache.

"While visiting my mother-in-law I remarked that she always made such good coffee, and asked her to tell me how. She laughed and told me it was easy to make good 'coffee' when you use Postum.

"I began to use Postum as soon as I got home, and now we have the same good 'coffee' (Postum) every day, and I have no more trouble. Indigestion is a thing of the past, and my complexion has cleared up beautifully.

"My grandmother suffered a great deal with her stomach. Her doctor told her to leave off coffee. She then took tea but that was just as bad.

"She finally was induced to try Postum which she has used for over a year. She traveled during the winter over the greater part of Iowa, visiting, something she had not been able to do for years. She says she owes her present good health to Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

MEXICAN PEACE PLAN ACCEPTED

Mediators and Delegates Have Agreed on a Scheme.

HUERTA TO BE ELIMINATED

Provisional Government of Five Men, Representing All Factions, to Rule Until an Election Can Be Held.

Here are the terms of the agreement reached by the Mexican mediators:

(1) A provisional government is to be placed in charge of Mexico. It is to consist of five men and to be representative of all factions, with constitutionalists in the majority.

(2) The government of the United States pledges itself to recognize this provisional government and also pledges to that government its moral support.

(3) American troops are to leave Mexico; they are to evacuate Vera Cruz the moment the provisional government is established and operative.

(4) Huerta is to remain in power during the organization of the provisional government and is to officially turn over to the provisional government the government of Mexico.

(5) Provisions are made for an election at a certain period of time after the establishment of the provisional government at which a president and other officers are to be chosen. Reforms in the election laws are provided for so that the election may be "popular, fair and impartial."

(6) The mediators made a strong recommendation to the new provisional government for radical reforms in the land laws.

Niagara Falls, Ont., May 28.—Mediation conferences, in progress one week today, have led to the adoption of the essentials of a plan for the pacification of Mexico. Details are withheld until there is a complete agreement on all subjects, but the main points of the plan on which both sides at present look favorably are the following:

The transfer of the executive power at Mexico City from the hands of Gen. Victoriano Huerta to a provisional president and four cabinet ministers. This body has often been referred to as a commission, or junta.

These five men will share equally the responsibility of putting into operation a program adopted at the conference for the conduct as soon as practicable of new elections for president, vice-president and members of congress. The five men would be neutral persons as far as political affiliations are concerned, but would be representative men, as nearly acceptable as possible to all factions in Mexico, including the constitutionalists, and approved by the American government.

Prompt recognition of the provisional government would be given by the United States.

Withdrawal of American troops is expected by the Mexican delegates to follow as a matter of course as soon as the new government is installed.

To Back Present Congress.

While there may be no formal declaration on the subject, the Mexican delegates expect a tacit understanding to be reached that the United States will regard as legal the financial transactions of the present Mexican congress.

In the protocol there will be proclaimed principles on which a study of the agrarian and educational problems of Mexico would be based, but there will be made no mention of individuals to compose the government.

The mediators and delegates intend to use every effort to maintain the secrecy of the names of individuals until all elements in the proposed new government have assented to the plan or the actual change in government is accomplished.

Arrange for Fair Elections.

It is understood there will be no reference in the protocol to the details of future elections, either as to forestalling any individuals from becoming candidates or prescribing the electoral machinery.

The protocol will declare simply for a general election, fair to all factions, and looking to the restoration of permanent government. The new president would serve until 1916, filling the unexpired term of the late President Madero.

Huerta has approved the main points in the plan. The Mexicans came with plenary powers, but have been referring vital issues to him, and he has been giving his approval of their work. Interests of the constitutionalists are being kept in mind by the mediators. Names agreed upon for the new provisional government are expected to be such as the constitutionalists might indorse.

The mediators do not expect the question of constitutionalist representation here to be reopened. The conferences have progressed too far for that. The belief is that the American government is sounding out the constitutionalists on details of the plans.

Good Cause for Alarm

Deaths from kidney diseases have increased 72% in twenty years. People overdo nowadays in so many ways that the constant filtering of poisoned blood weakens the kidneys.

Beware of fatal Bright's disease. When backache or urinary ills suggest weak kidneys, use Doan's Kidney Pills, drink water freely and reduce the diet. Avoid coffee, tea and liquor.

Doan's Kidney Pills command confidence, for no other remedy is so widely used or so generally successful.

"From childhood, I suffered from kidney trouble," says Anthony P. Kern, of Faribault, Minn., "and my life was a burden. I had terrible dizzy spells and my heart was badly affected. My back was lame and I kept getting worse steadily until I was a wreck. I happened to read of Doan's Kidney Pills and gave them a trial. PROBLEM FOR THE MAIDENS

In Hot Weather Will They Have to Come to Costume Somewhat Resembling Eve's?

Jerome S. McWade, the wealthy Duluth connoisseur, said at a recent dinner:

"I spent the winter on the Riviera. The winter fashions were really shocking—shocking, that is, to Comstock minds. Nothing shocks me.

"But in the evening, at the Nice County club dances, young girls would wear sleeveless gowns that left the back quite bare from the waist up. They could say truly—ha, ha, ha!—that they hadn't a stitch to their backs, eh? And in the afternoon at the dansants young girls would wear gowns that were either slashed to the knee, or else that were—a still subtler device—transparent to the knee, permitting the slim and silken limb to gleam through a panel of lace or tulle.

"A western millionaire at the Negresco, in Nice, on seeing his three daughters in gowns of this radical type, gave a loud laugh one day last winter and said:

"'By jingo, girls, what will you leave off when the hot weather comes?'"—New York Tribune.

A Surprise.

"Why are you so surprised to see me? Did not the maid tell you who it was that had called?"

"No, she only said: 'A gentleman'."

EFFIENCY OF A FIREFLY

Artificial Illuminant Very Poor Second to That of the Natural Organisms.

It is sometimes said that if we could arrive at the secret of the firefly—or of the other organisms which produce physiologic light—we should have reached a great economic discovery, because the light has such an extrordinary high efficiency. In other words, all the energy expended in producing it goes to make light, and not heat. The efficiency has been estimated at 96 per cent by Ives and Coblentz, and even higher by Langley and Very. This is the more remarkable when it is considered that the best artificial illuminant has a luminous efficiency of only 4 per cent, and most of them reach only about 1 per cent, the remaining 99 per cent of the energy going to produce heat or other subordinate effects. But even if we should discover the means by which the firefly produces its lights we should scarcely care to use it in our homes. Professor McDermott in a recent study of the subject observes that while the insect has indeed reached the highest possible radiant efficiency it has only accomplished at at a sacrifice of color that makes the light much worse than the mercury vapor arc. Anything not within a very limited range of yellow and green tones would appear black.

Tough on the Bears.

Some time ago Walter Shaw, known as one of Gardiner's most persistent wags, wrote a letter to the New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. It was deplorable, he said, the way the government men in charge of the Yellowstone park treated the wild animals. Just to cite one instance, he said, these scoundrels did not give the poor bears anything to eat during the entire winter, when the whole park is blanketed with snow.

The society immediately started an investigation, beginning at the office of the secretary of the interior. Such cruelty must be stopped. It pressed its investigation until some friendly naturalist told them that bears hibernate all winter.

Cubist Art.

"What are you painting from a soap box?"

"I am using a soap box as a model," answered the cubist with dignity, "but the subject of the painting is a young girl standing by a brook."

OUR BOG WEALTH

By E. VAN BENTHUYSEN.

Statistics show that there are enough unclaimed swamp-lands within Uncle Sam's domain to make nearly 5,000,000 farms of 160 acres each.

If placed side by side they would make a tract large enough to include all of the New England states, New York and New Jersey.

Florida alone could almost cover South Carolina with her everglades and kindred tracts.

Louisiana could blot out Delaware and Maryland, and have a good margin to space. The swamps of Minnesota, Michigan and Wisconsin, combined, would cover nearly one-third of either of the two last named states.

Since it is cheaper to drain than to irrigate, and the cost of perpetuating the improvement is but slight, the fact that drainage is now one of the prominent questions before congress is not strange.

To the west a new impetus has been given through irrigation; and it has added much to the nation's wealth. Maine and Florida, Minnesota and Louisiana have presented their needs for help, their possibilities.

As long ago as Washington's time, the possibilities of swamp-drainage were noticed, Washington himself seeing vaguely great agricultural resources in the Dismal Swamp.

The soil is alluvial, literally a garden prepared by nature. Similar sites already reclaimed, show an exuberance of vegetation. And if one wishes big onions and cabbages let him seek the drained swamp land.

There is untold wealth in the bottom of these bogs; and with their drainage will come freedom from mosquitoes and their attendant malaria.

THE DEVIL CHAIR

A Chronicle of the Strange Adventures of John Haynes and His Gyroscope Vehicle

THE ARM OF JUSTICE

By H. M. EGBERT

(Copyright by W. G. Chapman)

In his comfortable bachelor house in the Western town of Nokomis, Judge Charteris was seated in his arm chair. But he was not seated as a judge should sit, well poised and at ease, secure in the consciousness of his integrity and the approbation of his fellow men. Judge Charteris was huddled up and crouching forward, a drained glass of whisky and milk at his right hand, and at his left a hardly inhaled perfecto burning itself slowly away in an ash-tray. The Judge's face was an unhealthy yellow, touched here and there with streaks of livid white which gave it a curiously blotched appearance. And, in fact, the man was trembling upon the verge of a nervous breakdown.

He had returned that afternoon from the court in which he had earned a reputation for the severe sentences which he meted out to the wretched criminals who fell into the clutches of the law. There he exemplified the law's outraged majesty; but here he was nothing but a cowardly, weak, elderly man, with a whole life of evil and injustice stretching away behind him and the unknown future ever drawing more near.

The knowledge that his life was passing and that it had availed him nothing bore hardly on him at times of introspection. But now the cause of his despair was more immediate. It lay upon the table, a sheet of paper taken from an envelope that had been posted in Pittsburg, which he had received some minutes before. On the enclosure were scrawled four words: "Your turn comes next," they said.

That was all; there was no signature—but he knew well what that message portended. When, five years previously, he had assisted in the Nokomis Land Company's nefarious scheme in return for a thousand shares in it, he had imagined that he could place his memories away and grind his conscience under foot, as he had done so many times. John Haynes, the millionaire owner of the estates which the land gang had coveted, was an Englishman, ignorant of the law, the customs, and of the country. He had been torn from his wife and daughter, railroaded into the penitentiary for fourteen years as Pete Timmons, a gang leader—and the gang secured his lands, those upon which Nokomis stood. Five years went by—five years of loneliness and despair for Haynes. Then he was placed in the penitentiary machine shop, where he invented a gyroscopic attachment which would propel any vehicle at an incredible rate of speed; he had escaped by means of it, and, one by one, was hunting down and punishing the men who had betrayed and plundered him.

None of them knew where the next blow would fall or who would be the victim. Now here, now there, East, West and South, John Haynes went like the wind in some infernal contrivance propelled by his gyroscope. And each visit was followed by swift and terrible retribution.

Had it been death alone that would satisfy him, John Haynes might have been met by armed men; his victims would have taken heart and armed themselves and gone abroad like arsenals.

Judge Charteris looked up. The light was dying out of the West, the desolate prairies stretched almost up to the threshold of his home. Charteris shuddered. In such a land anything was possible. He would flee, he would go south to warmer climes and leave no trail behind him. The letter had been posted only two days before. Surely, if he acted at once, he could yet contrive to elude that terrible vengeance.

He would leave no sign of his departure. He would pack a couple of suit cases, rush East upon a special car to Des Moines or Omaha, and there vanish. His shares had been sold long since; his money was salted away in banks in various cities. If he abandoned everything in Nokomis, money, house, land, reputation, he could still reach Florida with more than a hundred thousand dollars in gold. Panic-stricken, he could think of nothing else to do.

He reached his trembling hand out to the telephone. "Give me Girouard, 27," he called. "Hello! Is that you, Mr. Hopkins? This is Judge Charteris speaking. I've got to go to Omaha at once on private business. Private, mind you; nobody must know. Can you get me a special car inside two hours?"

He heard the President of the Nokomis and Western answer:

"Sorry, but the trains are stalled in snow-drifts. Now if you wanted to go West I could manage it, but—"

"Then I'll go West," cried Charteris, terror-stricken at this conspiracy of the elements against him. "For God's sake get me a special car for anywhere—San Francisco, Portland, Los Angeles—"

Between himself and Hopkins existed an intimacy of many years' standing. It had been born in infamy, when both were struggling lawyers, it had been nursed by Charteris through days of growing self-respect and importance, until it blossomed into a close league for mutual aid. In the end he arranged to go to Portland, Oregon. Charteris knew that Hopkins would not betray him.

In a cluster of trees, perched upon the summit of the lone hill that dominated the town, John Haynes was watching the Judge's house, which stood on the outskirts of Nokomis, through a powerful field-glass.

He knew that the letter would reach him when he left his court that afternoon. He had seen him enter the house, saw it blaze up with lights, and, in imagination, saw his enemy receive the blow.

He was seated in a strange-looking vehicle. It might have been described best as a runabout, but it was unlike any make now on the market, for it was built like a farmer's cart, and as it snorted and puffed westward through the sparsely settled country it had excited great derision among the inhabitants, whose motor cars were always of the latest pattern. But what the bucolics of Kansas and Nebraska and Colorado did not know was that at night the four wheels were detached and placed within the vehicle, which, running upon a single wheel, driven by the gyroscope, outpaced the swiftest trains in its mad flight toward Nokomis. In a blinding snow storm John Haynes had brought his companion to their post on the top of the hill. The wheels were removed, the huge tank stored with gasoline; now they were waiting, comfortable enough in the warm and weather-proof interior, stocked as it was with food and even luxuries for road travel.

"He'll bolt," said Haynes with conviction. "Tomorrow morning he will take a train eastward. I know the dog; he won't dare wait to take his medicine."

Suddenly lights flashed through the gloom below them. Immediately afterward, borne across the stillness of the night air, came the chugging of a locomotive.

"He's going to bolt now!" John Haynes cried in exultation. "Theobald, your duty will soon be at an end."

"Thank God!" ejaculated the other forcibly, and, stooping down, he began to unroll a little surgeon's case in which were the instruments of his craft.

"You've done well, Theobald," said John Haynes, seating himself beside him. "And after to-night you can wipe me out of your memory. Reflect, man," he continued, placing his strong hands upon the other's shoulders, "you might have been in his situation to-night."

"It's a terrible job," said Theobald.

"All justice is terrible, Doctor," answered the other. "But it is less terrible than crime. When you assisted the land gang to railroad me into the penitentiary, when you left me crippled and helpless with a treacherous bullet in my spine which you were bribed not to remove—was not that terrible?"

"I know—I know," Theobald muttered, uncorking the bottle of bichloride of mercury with which he was to sterilize his instruments.

"When I held you at my mercy," John Haynes pursued relentlessly, "I laid upon you two conditions. First, that you should cure me—and that you did. Second, that when I summoned you you should obey my call. You have obeyed—and after tonight you can forget the past; it will be atoned for and you shall never see me again."

"But this—this is the dream of a madman!" muttered the doctor. "It can't succeed."

"It will succeed, Theobald," answered Haynes sternly, "and by reason of its inherent justice, even though it may be as you say, a madman's dream. Perhaps I am mad—but I have suffered and I will exact justice to the uttermost."

He broke off and, taking up the glass, peered long and hard through it. An automobile was chugging in the road before Judge Charteris' house. Down at the station a heavy locomotive was revolving on the turntable, just visible as the two bright lights spun their circular course through the gloom. Haynes placed his hand upon the steering wheel.

"East or West, it is all one," he said. "Theobald, are you ready?"

The doctor folded up his instrument case, Haynes pressed a spring and the strange vehicle sped off through the darkness at a moderate rate, ran into the prairie, and returned toward the station by a different route. Outside the yards it stopped and Haynes descended. Now it could be seen that he was wearing a dark gray uniform, upon the breast of which was a pointed star. The station master came up to him.

"Taking a special out to-night?" asked Haynes.

"What's that to you?" the other retorted. His eyes fell on the badge. "Who are you?" he demanded.

"I'm the sheriff of Blue River," answered John Haynes. "There's been an attempt at a hold-up in the Blue Mountains. Logs were placed across the line, and the west-bound limited was nearly derailed. Two bullets were fired and one went into the cab. It's believed to be the work of Clancy's gang."

"West bound, did you say?" exclaimed the other. "Why—why—" He broke off and eyed the other suspiciously again. "I guess there won't be no hold-ups with this special," he answered grimly. "There's nothing worth plundering aboard of her and there'll be two armed men in the cab. Get that?"

"You seem to think I'm one of the thieves," remarked Haynes petutantly in the broad dialect of the West.

"Why," said the other candidly, "maybe you are and maybe you ain't. But there won't be no hold-ups on this special. Thanks!"

Haynes spun on his heel as though offended and re-entered the vehicle, which proceeded slowly westward along the road that ran for a short distance parallel with the embankment. About a mile from the station it ended in a deep gully, beyond which was nothing but flat prairie for a hundred miles and a little more, untill the steep ascent of the Blue Mountain range began. Haynes laughed grimly as they sped through the darkness.

"He's going west, then," he said. "It's lucky we had this old auto covered, Theobald, for it must be nearly zero outside. Keep up your courage, man; in two hours, or three at the outside, all will be over and you'll be on your way back to your comfortable house in Nokomis, as snug as though you'd never left your bed to answer my summons."

They drew up the automobile and waited patiently, some distance from the road, in case the station master should send searchers for them. Three hundred feet from the embankment they would have escaped the observation of the most keen-eyed hunters in that darkness and in the snow which fell steadily about them.

Meanwhile Judge Charteris, suitcases in hand, was waiting at the railroad station. He had driven his own automobile through the bitter weather and now stamped impatiently up and down the platform, waiting for the engine and car to come alongside. When it arrived he noticed the two guards beside the driver.

"Who are those men?" he asked sharply.

"Assistants," answered the stationmaster. He would not arouse the Judge's fears by detailing the news of the hold-up which he had received. With sure instinct he had discerned the lie that had been told him. He had no doubt that the two men were actually members of Clancey's gang sent to make observations. But, being unarmed, he had prudently suffered them to withdraw. He had privately instructed the driver to keep a sharp look-out for obstacles upon the track. Only at one spot could such be placed, for the prairie stretched away, without a sign of a tree, clear to the Blue Mountains—and then on and on again until the foothills of the Rockies and the broad alkali plains confronted them. At the Blue Mountains only, where the engine must slow down to surmount the hills, could any attempt occur. And the guards carried loaded rifles.

Judge Charteris knew nothing of any danger. His only danger he felt he had shaken off when he stepped into his warm, comfortable car. Hopkins had not forgotten his love of comfort. Beside the sleeping berth was a table piled with magazines, a box of choice cigars, and a little case containing some of those liqueurs which the Judge dearly loved. When the train drew out of Nokomis he settled himself down in his chair, all fear forsaking him.

He meant to take ship at Portland for San Francisco under an alias; thence to double back on his tracks toward the south, possibly to cross into Mexico. His plans were not matured. Confident that he had outwitted his former victim, he placed his fears behind him.

He had no ties. He lived the luxurious, selfish life of an elderly bachelor. To break new ground was easy. He had no qualms. He had meant to retire soon anyway. He felt that he had acted wisely in arriving at his decision to fly.

He had heard the name Clancy mentioned softly as he was about to step into the car, and the word sent a sudden flash of recollection through his brain. He remembered Clancy—that patient, easy-going middle-aged man who had become involved in a law-suit with the Nokomis Land Company a year or two previously. Clancy had been a power in Nokomis by reason of his large interests there and his unswerving honesty. It had been a stiff fight before the land gang trapped him. Judge Charteris shivered as he remembered how, when he sentenced him to ten years in the penitentiary, Clancy had threatened him in court and denounced him as a tool of the confederates. Then had come the spectacular escape from prison; and the respectable, portly gentleman—a little like himself—had become an outlaw and the terror of the country. Yes, it was well that he had planned this flight.

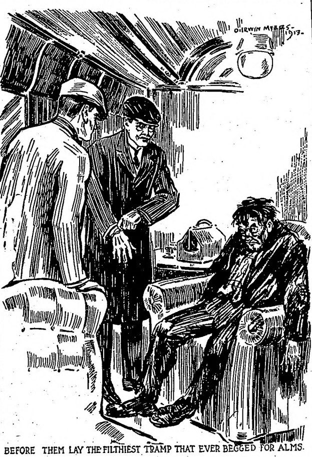
The train rolled on. A blissful peace descended over Judge Charteris. He nodded his head and dozed, his repose deepened, soothed by the good whisky with which his friend Hopkins had supplied him. When he awakened, he had reflected, he would be speeding through the desert, miles from Nokomis. Had he not better undress and go to bed? Before he answered his own question he was snoring in his chair.

Behind the train, so close that it might almost have formed an integral part of it, John Haynes and Theobald were speeding in their one-wheeled automobile upon a single rail. And underneath the busy gyroscope hummed, ever so faintly. Its tune accorded well with the Englishman's mind; it hummed as merrily as his own thoughts, and yet it soothed him with its monotonous murmuring. All the while the snow fell steadily. But the automobile ran through it snugly and comfortably; there was not the slightest jar or vibration. When the train quickened its speed the vehicle did the same. It could have outpaced the train in a run of a hundred miles and met her half way back.

"We must be nearing the foothills of the Blue Mountains, Theobald," said John Haynes, half an hour later. "They stretch for forty miles or so before we enter upon the steepest grade at the head of Blue River. I think we'll make our preparations."

Theobald shivered and rose, grasping his instrument case. At that moment he felt like a man bewitched, helpless, hypnotized by the power of his terrible master.

Haynes slowed down to twenty miles, leaped the machine from the rail to the roadbed, and, putting on speed again, caught up with the vanishing train. Throwing back the hood of the runabout, he stood upon the step a moment in the pelting snow, ran alongside of the train, and flinging a rope noose, one end of which was fixed to his steering wheel, made the runabout fast. He leaped aboard the train, and standing on the back platform, he strained at the rope, working it until the runabout shifted her course, caught the rail again and ran on smoothly behind. Then, at his signal his companion leaped aboard, instrument case in hand.



BEFORE THEM LAY THE FILTHIEST TRAMP THAT EVER BEGGED FOR ALMS.

To force the door of the car was the work of a few moments. Then the two men crept cautiously inside. Judge Charteris was sleeping profoundly in his chair, his drained glass by his side, his hands folded across his abdomen and a smile of perfect happiness upon his face. He did not stir as they approached, but snored in drunken slumber.

Haynes took the cigar box from the table, selected a perfecto, lit it, and began to smoke. The doctor shook his head nervously when his companion offered him one. He was agog to finish his work and be gone. Haynes smiled indulgently, and seeing that Theobald was almost overcome by the tension, opened his case and drew out the bottle of chloroform. He crumpled up his handkerchief, saturated it, and clapped it over the Judge's face.

A sigh, a stir—and then the Judge's breathing deepened and became stertorous and slow. A deathly pallor began to overspread his face. When Haynes removed the handkerchief at last he lay profoundly still.

"How long will it last?" asked John Haynes coolly.

"Fifteen minutes," said Theobald, wringing his hands.

"That will be time enough?"

"Ample."

"Then get to work."

He turned aside and seating himself in the chair, took up a magazine and read. Inside he saw a picture of his gyroscope attached to an invalid chair. "The devil-chair," the editors had captioned it, and Haynes read the article with a quiet chuckle. It was right in its statements, embodying as it did the principle of the gyroscope correctly. But it did not mention the device by which Haynes had attached it to the gasoline engine which controlled it; nor had the author the least conception of the personality of this "devil of crime," as he quaintly depicted him. Haynes was glad of these things, for as long as the nature of his contrivance remained unknown he felt secure from capture, and with his own scheme unguessed at, he could be sure of success. None of the land gang would dare to reveal the story. Above the rattle of the train he heard the fussy, panting breathing of his ally as he moved to and fro, busy about his work. Suppose he should assault him with his instruments or tie a chloroform wrapped cloth round his own face, he thought—and smiled. He did not turn his head. He was a judge of men.

"It's finished," said Theobald, fifteen minutes later, and Haynes arose. At the first sight he started back in sheer amazement; then laughed uproariously at the grim humor of the situation. For Theobald had done his work too well. The sight of the face of his old enemy had filled Haynes with scarcely controllable anger; but now—it was a different man. For Theobald had almost bloodlessly made deft little cuts in certain facial muscles which made the cheeks hang flabby and loose; he had touched tiny muscles about the eyes and eyelids which had altered the whole aspect of the Judge's face, he had filled in the sagging flesh under the eyes with paraffin, even now hardening and not distinguishable from healthy tissue; he had given an upward turn to the eyebrows and a scowling droop to the mouth; and lastly he had snipped one infinitely small muscle in the sclerotic membrane of the eye which made Charteris' eyes, when the lids were lifted, diverge extravagantly.

And Clancy had a pronounced squint of just that character. Theobald had done his work too well.

"Now come, there is no time to lose," said Haynes, with gusty anger. "Wait there, and hold him if he attempts to wake." He stepped out on the platform of the car, pulled in the lagging runabout, and bending down drew out a bundle of clothes and a mud-caked painter's brush, which he moistened in the snow outside the car. They stripped Judge Charteris of his clothes, which they threw into the runabout, and attired him in the bundle of filthy rags which they had taken with them for just such a purpose. Then they besprinkled his face and hands with mud from the brush, stepped back, and watched him critically. Before them lay the filthiest tramp that ever begged for alms.

Outside a flash of lights lit up the gloom and disappeared behind them.

The train ran through the station and began to ascend a grade.

"That must be the Blue River," said Haynes, pointing out into the darkness. "This is the steepest grade of the line. At the top we uncouple her. Wake him, Theobald."

The doctor shook the sleeping man. Slowly the Judge's eyes unclosed. He stared at the two with vacancy; presently a gleam of intelligence came into his face.

"Who—who are you?" he gasped, rising and staggering toward them.

John Haynes, standing facing him, his back against the mirror which was fixed in the wall of the compartment immediately opposite the sleeping berth, looked at the shaking man quizzically.

"You don't know me, Judge Charteris?" he asked.

Charteris stared at him in horror, raised his hand to his head, and tottered backward into the arms of Dr. Theobald.

"Merciful God!" he gasped and let his hands fall to his sides like a paralytic.

"You got my letter, Judge Charteris?" continued Haynes, eyeing him more sternly. "You ought to know me, since you consigned me to the hospitality of the State for fourteen years."

The Judge staggered forward again. He passed his hand across his face; he still seemed dazed. Haynes moved aside and let him see his reflection. In the mirror a wretched tramp, mud splashed and ragged, stared back at Charteris. The Judge shook his head like a bull, went near, made motions with his hands and arms, and suddenly, with a fearful cry collapsed insensible at Haynes' feet. The train was moving at no more than eight miles an hour, for the engine was puffing near the summit of the hill. From his post in the cab the engine-driver was watching the track for obstacles, while the two armed guards shivered and clapped their arms across their breasts.

Noiselessly Haynes crept to the front platform, leaped to the ground and reached for the couplings. His task was one which few men could have accomplished. But in the loneliness of the penitentiary Haynes had developed the muscles of his right arm into those of a giant, before he had invented his machine, and while he yet dreamed of physical vengeance upon his enemies. As the train poised itself upon the top of the hill, almost immovable, waiting to make the downward plunge, Haynes uncoupled the engine and leaped back into the car.
